

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

LONDON, JANUARY 17, 1846.

WE have had of late several instances of petition of right being presented to the Sovereign. In Ex parte Pering, (1 Dowl. P. C. 760), which arose upon a contract with the Admiralty, such a petition was presented, which, as Mr. Anstey observes, in a learned pamphlet recently published on this subject*, miscarried, because, the indorsement being general, "Let right be done," the suppliant, instead of going into Chancery, went into the Exchequer, a court which had no jurisdiction to receive a petition so indorsed†.

A petition of right is, properly, the supplication of the subject, addressed to the Sovereign, for justice, in every case where, from the defect of jurisdiction of the established courts of judicature, there would be a failure of justice, if they were relied upon for granting it. It is true, that, as Mr. Anstey, already quoted, observes, "it does so happen, that, at the present day, the only case in which such failure of jurisdiction is possible is that of a pecuniary demand upon the Sovereign." But, as there are still many possible cases, such as those of The Baron de Bode (4 Jur. 645) and Viscount Canter- bury v. The Attorney-General, (1 Phil. 315), in which pecuniary demands may be made on the Sovereign, the learning of petitions of right is not to be despised as utterly antiquated, nor is it undesirable that legislative provisions should be made, if necessary, for enabling the Crown practically to "do right," as well as to say, "Let right be done."

The importance of the petition of right has of course diminished with the improvement of the established judicature of the country. In the older precedents we find matters dealt with by petition of right, which would at this day be brought under the jurisdiction of the courts of law or of the Court of Chancery. But the jurisdiction is not gone, although it is most materially crippled even in the few cases to which it is still applicable, by the general inability of the Crown to do justice.

In the days when the remedy of the subject was sought frequently by petition of right, the Crown had, in fact, large revenues, large estates, large and not always defined rights. Hence arose transactions with the subjects of the realm, in which the Crown might be aggressor or aggrieved; but in which, if aggressor, and if, upon being approached by way of petition of right, it ordered justice to be done to the suppliant, it had the independent power and means of doing justice, by making compensation out of its own resources.

But, since the abolition of the independent rights of property of the Crown, and the substitution for them of a civil list, of which every pound almost is parcelled out for some settled public service or private necessity, the petition of right has necessarily fallen much into desuetude, not only because the occasions for its application have so materially diminished, but because to use it as a remedy is, in general, something like filing a bill in Chancery against an insolvent estate, in which you may get your decree, but when you have got it

* "Letter to Lord Cottenham," &c. By T. Chisholme Anstey, Barrister. Stevens & Norton, London.

† In this case letters-patent had been granted for an invention for improving the construction of anchors. The patent contained, as is usual in the case of inventions of a nature likely to be available for the public service, a proviso for making the same void if the patentee should not supply for his Majesty's service all such anchors as he should require, at such reasonable prices as should be settled by the Lords of the Admiralty. The Admiralty had anchors made according to the patent, and refused to give the patentee what he deemed an adequate remuneration. An application was made for a mandamus to the Lords of the Admiralty, to settle the prices and terms according to the patent. But it was refused. The next proceeding was the petition of right, which, as observed by Mr. Anstey, miscarried.

"The substitution," says Mr. Anstey, "of a civil list in the stead of the hereditary revenues, which was begun in the same reign, (Charles II), was afterwards so effectually carried out by the Revolution of 1688, that the people are now familiarised with the change, and have long since ceased to wonder, much less to feel indignant, at the iniquity and exorbitance of the concession thus wrung from the Crown, for a consideration, which, small at first, has become in every succeeding reign smaller and smaller; and which appears to have reached its minimum in the reign of her present Majesty. The change, however, has had one incidental consequence, with which it is more my present purpose to deal. In transferring to Parliament the hereditary assets of the Crown, it has indirectly defrauded the Crown of the means of contenting its duty, by doing justice to its subjects. In shackling with appropriations the beggarly price paid for the transfer, it has environed the throne with a cloud of other claims, created by the occasion, through whom the suppliant for grace and right must fight his way to the presence. Hence the sudden growth and continuous augmentation of petitions to the lower House,—and canvassing of members,—and jebbery,—and intrigue,—as means for obtaining satisfaction of claims, which should, and formerly would, have been preferred to the person of the Sovereign! Hence the sudden, and almost final and utter desuetude and oblivion, into which the petition of right has sunk; the universal ignorance of the practice—I had almost said, of the right—which now reigns amongst us!"

We cannot say that we fully sympathise with this pathetic lamentation of Mr. Anstey, the english of which is, that we are to regret that the Crown has parted with its powers of oppression, because it has, at the same time, rendered unavailable the means formerly at its disposal for remedying oppression where it had been practised. But we apprehend, that, while men may reasonably rejoice that the relations of the Crown and the subject, are placed at this day upon so definite a footing, that there can be few occasions for the exercise of the prerogative of "seeing that right be done," because there are few opportunities left for allowing wrong to be done, still it would be desirable that the Legislature should place at the disposal of the Crown the means of giving compensation, that is, of substantially doing justice, wherever, from the still remaining imperfections of our judicature, a just claim exists against the state, for which no constituted body in the state is liable except the Crown; for which, therefore, the right to seek a remedy by petition of right, undoubtedly exists, while the enforcing of such remedy is in most cases utterly impracticable, because the Sovereign, as such, has no disposable property. We trust that Lord Cottenham will redeem, during the ensuing session, the promise that has elicited Mr. Anstey's more learned than methodical essay, by instituting a parliamentary inquiry into the state of the law upon petitions of right, and bringing in such measures of amelioration, as his own great learning and experience may suggest.

THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

"Leave wringing of your hands."

"Nihil quod est contra rationem est licitum; for reason is the life of the law—nay, the common law itself is nothing else but reason; which is to be understood of an artificial perfection of reason gotten by long study, observation, and experience, and not of every man's natural reason, for nemo nascitur artifex. This legal reason est summa ratio. And, therefore, if all the reason that is dispersed into so many severall heads were united into one, yet could he not make such a law as the law in England is; because, by many successions of ages, it hath been fined and refined by an infinite number of grave and learned men, and, by long experience, grown to such a perfection for the government of this realme, as the old rule may be justly verified of it: Neminem oportet esse sapientiores legibus,—no man out of his private reason ought to be wiser than the law, which is the perfection of reason." (Co. Litt. 97. b.)

"The knowledge of the law is like a deepe well, out of which each man draweth according to the strength of his understanding. He that reacheth deepest, he seeth the amiable and admirable secrets of the law. And as the bucket in the depth is easily drawn to the uppermost part of the water, (for nullum elementum in suo proprio loco est grave), but, take it from the water, it cannot be drawn up but with great difficultie; so, albeit beginnings of this study seem difficult, yet, when the professor of the law can dive into the depth, it is delightful, easie, and without any heavy burthen, so long as he keepe himselfe in his own proper element." (Id. 71. a.)

"The constant practice of conveyancers, which great and eminent judges have considered to be no mean evidence of the law." (Per Lord Langdale, Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 1.)

We experience, in recurring to these and similar visions of our legal youth, the same melancholy pleasure with which we call back the fairy tales and heroic legends which amused our actual childhood; and in both cases the reminiscence is accompanied with the sad reflection, that the law reformer and the schoolmaster, each in his own way, have taken effectual measures for securing all future generations from the seductions of the like pleasing illusion.

"And babes unborn shall rue the day,
When Brougham of law and lore made play."

Of the causes of these undesirable effects, that which has banished the mythology of the nursery is the least exceptionable. The antiquated lover of these antiquated fictions may, at least, console himself with the reflection, that the object of his affections remains unchanged—dead only to vulgar fame; but the conveyancer feels a deeper pang when he beholds his goddess falling into contempt, not from popular fickleness, but through the decay of her own attributes. No attorney's messenger, who has access to the statutes of the last few sessions, or hears the jokes that are made upon them in the office, will be so green as to take in Lord Coke's boast above quoted, or to receive any other reading of Finch's celebrated aphorism than this: "The sparks of all sciences in the world are raked out in the ashes of the law."

The case assumes a more desperate aspect, when we perceive that the divine patient has been reduced to this state, not through the meddling of ignorant quacks, but under the ministrations of men of high reputation, acting with the sanction of the Lord Chancellor,—a leading conveyancer and Queen's counsel and others,—whom, as they have avowed themselves, we may name—

Messrs. Hayes, Christie, and Bellenden Ker*. Mr. Ker has expounded the views of himself and his colleagues in a letter to the Lord Chancellor, which has been given to the world, and which, if its authority is to be received, effectually disproves the boast of conveyancers, that their practice is regulated by the rules of an exact science. The letter has not been settled with a view to conciseness; and we can, therefore, afford space only for a few extracts.

After premising that the commissioners (as we may call them) have reviewed the Act to facilitate the Transfer of Property, with the intention, first, of confining it to points which may safely admit of being separately treated, and, secondly, of legislating upon those points with greater accuracy and perspicuity, Mr. Ker proposes altogether to omit the 9th and 10th sections of the Transfer Act.

"First, as regards the 9th section, which provides for the conveyance of a mortgaged estate by the executor or administrator of the mortgagee, the design is good; but it is so imperfectly carried out by the very limited terms of the enactment, that, practically, the power is attended with very little real advantage. It is necessary, for the purposes of title, to ascertain that possession has not been taken, that no action or suit is pending, and that the legal estate is vested in the real representative of the mortgagee. But it is obvious that the necessity of proving these facts, and, particularly, the fact of the legal estate being vested in the real representative, (the very difficulty being that the heir is unknown), destroys in a great measure the utility of the enactment. The clause, besides, authorises a conveyance only on actual payment to the executor or administrator of the whole debt, not extending to a conveyance on part payment, or a conveyance under any arrangement for exonerating the whole or part of the land without payment; nor to cases where the money has been paid in the mortgagee's lifetime, or the executor has received the money at a former period, or has assumed to a bequest of, or has assigned, the debt. And, moreover, as the power—a bare statutory authority—is not conferred on the praying executor alone, it might be considered (though not, we think, on a just view of the provision) necessary to its due execution that an executor who has not proved, or had even renounced the probate, should join; a possible construction, which would not only narrow still further the range of the power, but probably implicate many titles depending on the contrary assumption."

After pointing out other deficiencies in the language of the clause, he thus proceeds: "Then, as regards the principle involved in this section of the act, if it be fit that a mortgagee's executor or administrator (who, after being paid in full, has no further interest in the matter, and who, as he might, be it observed, have recovered the debt, although unable to make or procure a reconveyance of the estate, may refuse to exercise the statutory power vested in him, as a mere instrument, for the convenience of others) should be enabled by his act to denude the heir or devisee of the legal estate, and vest it in the mortgagor or his nominee, it must, a fortiori, be fit that the unpaid executor or administrator should be enabled to command the legal estate for the purposes of the security, and the better administration of that portion of the assets of his testator or intestate."

After pointing out other directions in which the principle is capable of beneficial extension, the learned commissioner says: "Having arrived at the conclusion, that a free yet well-considered application of the principle already admitted by the Legislature is of the very essence of a wise and just amendment of the law of real property, no attempt has been made to fit the existing clause to the particular case at which it aimed. If, however, it should be deemed expedient to make a partial application of the principle,—to amend the law by engrafting upon it an anomalous provision,—the 9th section of the Transfer Act may be so modified as to attain more perfectly the very limited objects of its framers."

The commissioners recommend that the act should be repealed, and the clauses of which the policy is unexceptionable be re-enacted in a different form. They then go into detail; and, as to the 9th section, after shewing that its policy is unexceptionable, nay, essential to a wise and just amendment of the law, they conclude with "making no attempt." They think the object very desirable and very attainable, but they cannot make the effort necessary to attain it: it would fatigue them; put their faculties into a very unprofessional fluster, and take too much time. As any substituted provision would require to be "well considered," they decline the attempt. The summa ratio of a lawyer, directed to the task of amendment, becomes summa imbecillitas!

With regard to the 10th section, authorising trustees and surviving mortgagees to give discharges for money, the commissioners observe, that it could never have been intended that it should have the extensive operation which its words import, and they point out the limited and, as they admit, beneficial effect which was intended; but, as the clause to be restrained to such limited and beneficial operation would "require considerable alteration," they propose to omit it altogether! We hope that the treatment which the public experience at the hands of these gentlemen, after obtaining, through the intercession of a Lord Chancellor, the privilege of having its business done by them, is not a sample of what their private clients have to expect. What would an intending testator say, if his instructions were returned with the following marginal observation:—"This would be a very beneficial arrangement, but, as any attempt to carry it out would require to be well considered, we advise that it should be abandoned"?

What remains of Mr. Ker's letter is criticism on the construction of the clauses which are considered by the commissioners to be objectionable only in point of expression. As this is peculiarly the province of a lawyer, it is in this part of the letter that we must expect to find the "perfection of reason" promised by Lord Coke. We pass over the solemn discussion of the childish question as to progressive duty, which, it seems, some one raised on the 2nd section of the Transfer Act, and come to these observations on the same section:—

"When it is said that 'any person may convey by any deed, without livery of seisin or inrolment, or a prior lease,' it seems to be assumed that there is, in law, some standard instrument by which, with the addition of any of the above concomitants, the immediate freehold in lands may be conveyed; but there is, in fact, no such instrument in law. There are (besides a covenant to stand seised) three several assurances adapted to convey it, viz. feoffment, bargain and sale inrolled, and lease and release—all founded on different principles, differing in their modus operandi, and having an important difference in their effects. If the deed of conveyance established by the Transfer Act be a new statutory assurance, which is neither a feoffment nor a bargain and sale, nor a lease and release, it is merely nugatory to provide that such assurance shall be effectual 'without livery of seisin, inrolment, or prior lease'; for the forms and solemnities in question have not the slightest significance with reference to such a conveyance. While if, on the other hand, it be considered that the framers did not intend to introduce any new assurance, but only to exempt the existing assurances from useless and troublesome forms, the inattention to principle in the structure of the section is equally apparent; for it is not clear that it would not be necessary to attribute to the assurance the character either of a feoffment without livery, or a bargain and sale without enrolment, or a release without a lease for a year; and there seem to be no means of ascertaining to which of the three kinds of assurance the conveyance under the act would belong."

* Surely not. If the consequence of omitting the nonsensical words "without progressive duty" has been to oblige the Lord Chancellor to crave the assistance of three learned conveyancers to insert them, the insertion of the equally useless words "without livery," &c., may be justified.

* See Davidson's Concise Precedents, p. 10.

There is more in the same style, with which we will not trouble our readers. Here, again, we hope that the learned commissioner makes a distinction between the public and individuals as clients; for we can imagine the perplexity of an executor selling real estate, under a testamentary power "to sell and convey to the purchaser, without the necessity of the concurrence of the testator's heir or the legatee of the produce," if he were asked by Mr. Ker, whether his conveyance was to operate as "a standard instrument," or as a conveyance by the heir, or as a conveyance by the legatee?

With respect to feoffments, the commissioners think that the omission in the former act to require the solemnity of a deed was not well advised. They think, moreover, that, though wax or wafers are essential in the case of an adult, an infant conveying under a custom should not be trusted with such matters. We can understand why wax is interdicted; but, as an infant cannot burn his fingers with wafers, we contend that a distinction should have been made.

The reasoning by which it is attempted to be shewn that the repealed enactment, as to indenting deeds, was objectionable, is curious, but too long for extraction. We cannot let it pass, however, without protesting against the position, that a deed-poll cannot operate by way of estoppel.

From the observations on the provisions as to the conveyance of executory estates we must make one extract:—"As the 22nd section of the stat. 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 92, for the abolition of fines and recoveries, has provided, in terms somewhat different, for the conveyance of contingent interests, we have deemed it advisable to confine the 6th section of the proposed bill to England. The terms of the enactment for Ireland have not been pursued, because it appears to be so framed as to enable the original taker of a contingent interest to assign it, but not to confer on his assignee a similar power." In other words, "As there is an opportunity of having two different provisions for effecting the same object in different parts of the empire, we have thought it advisable to embrace it." Perhaps, before the next session, the Lord Chancellor may instruct the learned commissioners to prepare a bill "for assimilating the Laws of England and Ireland, with respect to the Conveyance of contingent Interests."

We have not left ourselves room in this Number to do justice to the observations on the protection of contingent remainders, the consideration of which, and also of some questionable positions on the assignment of attendant terms contained in Mr. Joshua Williams's able "Remarks on the Acts of the Session 8 & 9 Victoria relating to Real Property," and on Lord Brougham's Conveyancing Acts, contained in the last Number of the Law Review, we reserve for another paper. We have animadverted freely on the manner in which the Lord Chancellor's deputies have discharged their trust; for we are quite sure that the business of no private client of any of these gentlemen was ever slurred over with such indolent carelessness, and we do not see why the public, when in its capacity of client it receives more scurvy treatment than any of its individual members would submit to, is to acquiesce in deferential silence.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE BARON DE BODE'S CASE, WITH REFERENCE TO SOME DOCTRINES OF INTERNATIONAL LAW.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE JURIST.

The case of the Baron de Bode, in which judgment was lately given by the Court of Queen's Bench against the claimant, has attracted not less attention on the Continent than in England. Besides the practical application of the law of nations, as it resulted from the treaty of Westphalia, and the subsequent treaties between the European powers based upon it, it brings before us the municipal laws of three great countries—England, Germany, and France; and the peculiar conflict of laws it displays, renders it one of the most interesting international cases that has ever been decided by a court of justice: indeed, it is rather an European than an English case. For these reasons, and, as having been concerned in the case as one of the foreign advocates who at the trial at bar last year, gave evidence to the foreign law, I am sure you will pardon my offering for insertion in your valuable publication a few observations on some points of international law which the case presents to view.

I, of course, assume that Lord Denman (for whom every one feels the highest respect) has, in his judgment, strictly applied the English law; and, as far as can be collected from the reports of it at present accessible, the principal grounds, in an international point of view, on which the court refused to give judgment for the claimant are these: that, by the treaties of 1786, 1814, and 1815, a British subject, whose property had been confiscated during the French Revolution, or detained in France, could only claim indemnification in case such confiscation or detention was contrary to the laws of France; that, from the facts as alleged by the Baron, and found by the jury at the trial at bar, the court could not collect that the property had been unduly or illegally confiscated; that, by the Baron's own shewing, it, on the contrary, appeared that the confiscation had taken place by the adjudgment of some French tribunal on the ground of the claimant emigrating to, or rather taking refuge in, the Austrian army, whilst the latter was invading the soil of France: that the Baron's birth could not make him so much a British subject as not to be amenable to French law, which would be inconsistent with the principles of local allegiance; that there was no complaint made of this being unlawfully enforced by the tribunal, though, even if there had been, the Court of Queen's Bench could not sit as a court of error on points of French law, or as a court of appeal for the revision of sentences of a French tribunal.

It appears to me that the above argumentation is based on a misconception of the meaning of some important expressions in the treaty of 1814. The words of the 4th additional article of the treaty of 30th May, 1814, between Great Britain and France, which principally concern Baron de Bode's right to indemnification, are, "indument confiscués"—unduly confiscated. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench interprets this term as if it had the same meaning as "illegally confiscated," and bases on this the proposition, that the Baron de Bode had neither shewn that he had done no illegal act to justify the confiscation, nor how the Court of Queen's Bench could sit as a court of error or appeal over a French tribunal.

A foreign lawyer may well be permitted to ask, is English forensic language so vague and illogical as to confound the meanings of the words illegal and undue? It is true, that, in the English translation of the 4th additional article of the treaty of 1814, (which translation is, as far as I understand, an official one), accompanying the papers when laid before Parliament, the words "induement confiscués" were rendered "illegally confiscated." But the Court of Queen's Bench appears to have been well acquainted with the words in the original sense: and in the judgment both the words "unduly" and "illegally" are used without distinction, as having one and the same meaning. I apprehend that the word "illegally" (illegalement) was intentionally not used in the 4th article of the above convention, but the word "induement," which is very far from meaning the same thing. Could the governments that were parties to the treaties of 1814 and 1815, by which the war against the French Revolution was terminated, intend that any one of the confiscations inflicted by the public authorities of revolutionary France should be legal in the true sense of the word, incurring thereby the necessary inference, that the acts of the Revolution were regarded as legal by the very governments who had fought so many battles against revolutionary France, and were then on the point of restoring to her the old order of things? Supposing that the words "unduly confiscated" were not a mere diplomatic phrase, but that they were given to convey some practical meaning; this meaning, and the sense to be ascribed to them, can amount to nothing more than to afford some guarantee to France, that, on the part of England, no wanton claims of indemnification should be raised,—no claims which were not justified by circumstances.

The French confiscations for emigrating in order to evade the working of the Revolution and its dangers, had more the nature of political measures against those who were opposed to the principles of the Revolution, than of judicial proceedings for offences against the law of France. In the eyes of the parties to the restoration, by whom the conventions of 1814 and 1815 were concluded, the confiscations can never have appeared in the character of legal acts. This cannot have even been the case with respect to Frenchmen, who owed natural allegiance to their sovereign, how much less, then, with respect to foreigners, who, as mere subditi temporarii, owed only temporary obedience to French laws during the time of their actual residence in that country,—who were under no obligation of positive law whatever to fight for the revolutionary government, but who might leave the country and go wherever and whenever they pleased? The Baron de Bode is no Frenchman, and could offend against no French law by leaving France and seeking refuge in the Austrian army. His allegiance to the French sovereign power was no other than that of any other foreigner. His being the owner of a landed estate within the territory of France made no change in that respect, for the possessing landed property does not in itself, according to the law of the continental states, constitute allegiance. By the law of almost all continental states, foreigners may own landed property; but their position with respect to the government is not affected by such ownership; it remains the same as that of other foreigners. A foreigner possessing landed property is bound to plead to all real actions, and answer all claims concerning his estate; but in all other respects he only owes obedience to the laws of the country for the time of his residence there. But the Baron de Bode stood, as a member of the German immediate nobility, in a peculiar position, which made him even less than the generality of foreigners, dependent on French law. His lord paramount was the Archbishop of Cologne, and he possessed the privilege of his estate, though lying within the territory of France, not being subject to French law. He had that privilege by the treaty of Westphalia, that is to say, by the positive law of nations; the independence of the immediate German nobility possessing estates in Alsace from the sovereign power of France having been guaranteed by all treaties between the European powers, from the treaty of Westphalia to the French Revolution. Certainly no other English-born subject, who possessed property in France, stood in so favourable and exceptional a position with respect to French law, as the Baron de Bode; and if the confiscation of his property was not "undue," then I do not know what other confiscation of English property could have been so.

The Court of Queen's Bench maintains that it has no right to sit as a court of error or appeal over a French tribunal. The correctness of this principle cannot be denied, and ought to constitute a part of the municipal law of all nations. It certainly is most objectionable to find the courts of justice of some of the continental states, especially of France, arrogating to themselves the authority of sitting as in some sort courts of appeal over foreign sentences. From that principle, as laid down in the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, it does not, however, in the least follow, that a court is bound to acknowledge and uphold all foreign sentences, without distinction, which may be alleged by parties in actions at law. This would, indeed, be a novel principle in the law of nations. On the contrary, it must be regarded as a general rule of the law of nations, that no state will execute or impart any validity within its territory to a sentence by which one of its own subjects has been grossly injured. By acknowledging this principle, and declaring that the Baron de Bode had, by the confiscation of his property, been grossly injured in his rights by a French tribunal, the Court of Queen's Bench would not have in the least assumed the authority of a court of error or appeal over a French sentence.

C. G., Advocate.

We have great pleasure in inserting the foregoing observations on the Baron de Bode's case, communicated to us by a foreign advocate. Our readers will not, however, take it for granted that we coincide in the view of our learned correspondent. The distinction that he makes between "induement" and "illegally" is, we apprehend, not one of which a court of law in this country, nor, as we apprehend, in any country, can take notice, even if it exists at all, which we doubt. "Induement" means that which ought not to be; ce qui ne doit pas se faire; ou, qui ne doit pas être. Now, in the legal language of England, and again we apprehend of all civilised countries, that which ought not to be, is illegal; for a court of law can take no cognisance of what ought or ought not, politically speaking, to be done. Nor are we at all aware that the government of this country, although repudiating the political validity of the government of republican France, necessarily denied jurisdiction to courts of justice acting under the authority of that government.

Again, our correspondent argues, that, although it may be admitted that a court of justice in one country, cannot sit as a court of appeal from the decision of a foreign court, yet it ought not, as a matter of course, to uphold the decision of every foreign court. But how is a court to inquire into the propriety of the finding of a foreign court, unless it does arrogate to itself the jurisdiction to sit as a court of appeal over it? There can be no right of inquiry, unless there is a right of redress; and to claim a right of redress, is to claim a right of reversing the judgment of the foreign tribunal. There can, we apprehend, be no medium between claiming the right to review, and to reverse, if thought necessary, the proceedings of a foreign tribunal, and refusing to disturb in any manner its decision.—Ed.

LONDON, JANUARY 24, 1846.

It has been, and is, too much the fashion in writings professing to point out the course of study fitted to form an accomplished Barrister, to lay out a map of so immense a field of knowledge, that every one, with common sense, must see the impossibility of any one man having time and strength to travel over it; and must suspect either that the writer has written without thought, or that his object in writing has been, not to tell the student really what he ought to do, but to astonish his readers with a picture of the wonders that he the writer must be supposed to have performed.

Even Mr. Warren, in his delightful book on Law Studies,—a book containing much sound wisdom, not the less practical because it is clothed in the language of enthusiasm,—even Mr. Warren, who, to use a homely expression, “ought to know better,” and does know better, stretches out before the appalled student such a fearful list as must make any man think, if he is not too much stunned by the disclosure to think at all, that, to become a Barrister qualified to plead with credit, and to satisfy the other exigences of a Barrister's position in the world, requires the intellect of a demi-god, and the habits of one who, like the miraculous child of Zanoni, can be ever smiling, ever thoughtful, and ever sleepless*.

Mathematics, chemistry, history, political economy, logic, and a dozen other things, appertaining both to abstract science and to its practical application, are prescribed as the discipline and the preparation for studying the law. And when we come to the great study itself, then so many books are prescribed as part of the necessary course of reading, that, to believe in the truth and soundness of the doctrine thus laid down, one must adopt the maxim, “Credo quia impossibile est.”

It should not be forgotten, in planning the destinies of a young lawyer, that the greatest men are not those who know most, but those who can do most; that he who is for ever reading, can have no time for thinking, for organising and classifying his knowledge, and for so incorporating it with his mind, that it becomes a part of him, and can be used at a moment's notice with vigour and precision.

A certain amount of classical and scientific knowledge is undoubtedly proper, not to form the Barrister in particular, but to form the gentleman; and, undoubtedly also, occasions will occur, in the career of a lawyer, as well as of the members of many other professions, in which unforeseen events may call for knowledge, which, if he does possess, the better for him; but the possibility that a lawyer may have to deal with a case involving chemical or mechanical, or even military, knowledge, is no more a reason for his attempting, before entering upon the study of the law, to be well acquainted with chemistry, or mechanics, or fortification, and gunnery and strategy, than the possibility that an officer may be called upon, as military secretary to a colonial governor, to preside as Vice-Chancellor over a colonial court of equity, would be a reason for every young gentleman destined for the army, being told to read Story's Equity Jurisprudence, Mitford on Pleading, and Daniell's Practice, &c., before he could creditably go to Sandhurst or to Woolwich.

The true course for a man intending to go to the bar, is, we believe, this: assuming that he is prepared by a liberal education, such as no gentleman ought to lack, let him, both before commencing and while pursuing his purely legal education, select those branches of human knowledge for which he feels some love; and, if he feels no love for any in particular, then let him select those which tend to historical and political instruction. Let him, on these subjects, acquire knowledge by the careful reading and re-reading of a few of the best books that treat of them, (there are not in any branches of human knowledge a great many good books), and by thinking of the subjects of those books in the intervals of time not necessarily devoted either to professional study or to pure amusement. In this way an able man may become, by the time he has reached mature manhood, tolerably profound and accomplished in some one or two departments of human knowledge, besides that which he professes, and may be able to wield the knowledge that he has so acquired for the benefit of his clients and of his own reputation. They who can do even this, do much; and they who can do more, must be preternatural men, men of whom there is not one born in an age.

With regard to professional reading, we should recommend the same principles to be kept in view, modified, of course, by reference to the consideration, that, as a man applies the largest portion of his time and mental labour to the subject of his professional pursuit, he can of course extend his researches more widely therein than in any other field of inquiry. However we are not, for the student, advocates of extensive reading, but rather of repeated and thoughtful reading, and above all, at the commencement, of difficult reading*. The good books which unfold the principles of the law are few, and the object of the incipient lawyer should be to saturate his mind with principles. It would be far better, for instance, for a student intending to acquire a knowledge of equity pleading, to read again and again Lord Redesdale's Treatise, and the chapters on pleading in Daniell's Practice, than to run through these works and everything that is said about equity pleading in a variety of other practical works,—all useful in their way, and fit to be consulted in after years in the transaction of business, but all repetitions of the matters contained in the two treatises that we have named, so far as principles are concerned. So, with regard to conveyancing, we would infinitely prefer, in point of value, the knowledge of a man who should have thoroughly possessed himself of Mr. Hayes' Introduction, or of Burton's Compendium, or of Watkins's Principles, (with Morley's Notes), than that of the student who should be able to say, that he had in the same time read through the six volumes of Cruise's Digest, and all the notes in Bythewood's Precedents, and half-a-dozen conveyancing works besides. Not that we would discourage from extensive reading in the end; for our view is, that, for many years of the professional career of a lawyer, scarcely any piece of business ought to be or can well be transacted by him, without much and careful reading on the learning connected with it; so that, in a course of ten years or so, every lawyer who is in earnest will have read most extensively. But what we discourage, as worse than useless,—as pernicious, and, in many cases, absolutely fatal,—is the notion that the value of the knowledge acquired, is in proportion to the quantity of lines over which the eye has travelled.

Against the practice founded upon such a notion, it is, that we protest; and our advice to every student who means to be a lawyer is, to ascertain what are the best books on the law, and to read those till he fully understands them. He may at the end of a year have read but a dozen books, while his more voracious fellow-student will have read forty; but the reader of the twelve will be at the end of the year the better lawyer of the two.

We may, perhaps, in some future Number, supply a deficiency which naturally exists in Mr. Warren's work, by pointing out an advantageous course of reading for the student intending to go to the conveyancing and equity bar.

THE AMENDMENT OF THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

On the subject of contingent remainders Mr. Ker's Letter contains the following remarks:—

"As to section 8 of the Transfer Act, and also of the proposed bill. The 8th section of the act would seem to have had these objects: first, to preclude the creation after the 31st December, 1844, of contingent remainders, liable, under the doctrine relating to contingent remainders, to be defeated by the premature failure of the particular estate; secondly, to enlarge the scope of such contingent limitations, created after the 31st December, 1844, as would be liable, under the doctrine of contingent remainders, to be defeated by the failure, even at maturity, of the particular estate; thirdly, to preserve contingent remainders created before the 1st January, 1845, from being defeated by the premature failure of the particular estate. Of these objects the first and second are sought to be effected by enacting, in substance, that all contingent limitations, created after the 31st December, 1844, which, according to the pre-existing law, would be contingent remainders, shall operate as executory devises or uses, with all the properties of such a devise or use."

"1. As a contingent devise or use, though by way of remainder, is necessarily unexecuted, (while an executory devise or use is not necessarily contingent), the term 'executory' does not, in strictness, ascertain the peculiar species of limitation with which, by this enactment, all contingent remainders, whether created at the common law or by way of use or devise, are intended to be identified. The executory devise or estate to which reference is intended to be made is of course a contingent devise or use, so limited as to be incapable of taking effect as a remainder; and the true interpretation, therefore, of the enactment is, that 'a contingent limitation by way of remainder, whether created at the common law or under the Statute of Uses, or by devise, shall take effect in the very same manner as a contingent use or devise not limited by way of remainder.' Now, in order to satisfy the terms of this enactment, it appears to be necessary that we should, in the first place, apply the learning of contingent remainders, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the given limitation would, under the old law, have taken effect as a contingent remainder or not; and in the next place apply the learning of executory devises or uses for the purpose of inventing an hypothesis adequate to give that limitation all the effect of an executory devise or use,"

* We recommend a student to commence with difficult books, as a test of the strength of his mind and the determination of his character. It is well that he should know whether he is really clear of head and firm of purpose, before he enters upon a profession which tolerates no mental weakness of any kind.

[the act says nothing of executory uses]; "and we must, if possible, so work out this process, as that, while we attribute to the limitation (for this the enactment expressly requires) all the peculiar qualities of an executory devise or use, none of the beneficial properties* which the same limitation, taking effect as a remainder, would have possessed, may be sacrificed. But, having ascertained that the given limitation would have been valid as a contingent remainder, then, as it is of the very essence of an executory devise or use to have (in contradistinction to a remainder) a substantive self-dependent existence, and to be incapable of taking effect as a remainder, we are compelled to disconnect the limitation in construction or supposition of law from the particular estate."

This exposition might have been very clear and useful if the subject had stood in need of anything of the sort; but, as it so happens that the text conveys its meaning to the understanding much more shortly, and with greater perspicuity, than the commentary, we must regard the latter as a piece of mere mystification, like that which M. Jourdain's preceptor throws over the art of speech:—

"Le Maître de Philosophie.—L'R se prononce en portant le bout de la langue jusqu'au haut du palais; de sorte qu'étant frôlée par l'air qui sort avec force, elle lui cède, et revient toujours au même endroit, faisant une manière de tremblement: R, RA.

"Monsieur Jourdain.—R, R, RA; R, R, R, R, RA. Cela est vrai. Ah! l'habile homme que vous êtes, et que j'ai perdu du temps! R, R, RA."

"Le Maître de Philosophie.—Je vous expliquerai à fond toutes ces curiosités."

We need scarcely remind our readers that the only distinction between "executory devises" and "contingent remainders" (terms which, as they are perfectly well understood, we see no reason for quarrelling with) is, that contingent remainders will take effect according to the expressed intention, unless prevented by the operation of certain technical rules, (including, either expressly or virtually, the rule against perpetuities), while executory devises will take effect according to the expressed intention, without being subject to any restriction other than that imposed by the rule against perpetuity. When, therefore, we find that contingent remainders have ceased to exist in our law, in other words, that the technical rules by which the intention expressed in certain kinds of future limitations was formerly liable to be defeated are abolished, we abandon the distinction which the existence of those rules alone made necessary, and, treating all future limitations as being subject to the same law, only inquire in each case what is the expressed intention, and how it agrees with the rule against remoteness. To inquire, before we decide on the operation of a limitation which we know is to be construed as an executory devise, whether, under an obsolete law, it would have been treated as a contingent remainder, is mere pedantry†. This is the plain meaning of perhaps the plainest enactment that ever appeared on the statute book. But we have yet scarcely penetrated the outer boundary of the fog which the Lord Chancellor's correspondent has cast around the subject:—

"If we take the common case of a settlement to the use of A. for life, and from and after his death to the use of his first and other sons successively in tail, and suppose the life estate to have been created by one instrument and the fee to have been limited by another instrument, (subject to the life estate), to the use of the first and other sons of A. in tail, the limitation to the sons might take effect out of the reversion in fee, as an executory use, and yet confer, on the birth of a son, and in the lifetime of A., a vested estate tail; so that, in the case supposed, the limitation would, while in suspense, be wholly independent of the life estate, and, of course, unaffected by its premature determination, and yet be capable of conferring, on the happening of the contingency, all the advantages of a vested remainder. This hypothesis, however, is inadmissible, for, in the state of circumstances supposed, the limitation to the sons would not have taken effect as a contingent remainder, nor, consequently, would it be within the provisions of the 8th section of the Transfer Act."

So far, so thick. If any one of our readers can see any meaning or purpose in the above extract, we shall be glad to hear from him. In what follows there is a glimmer of light:—

"We are, therefore, reduced to the necessity of taking the limitations of the settlement as they stand expressed in one and the same instrument; first viewing them in the relation of particular estate and remainder, in order to raise the case contemplated by the act; then detaching, in construction, the limitation to A., and reading the limitation to the sons as a substantive limitation 'from and after the death of A. to the use of his first and other sons successively' in tail. Now, assuming this to be the only process by which a limitation, required to have at once the distinctive characteristics of a contingent remainder and all the essential qualities of an executory devise or use, can be conceived to partake of such opposite natures, we are met by the difficulty of shewing, either that, consistently with the doctrine of executory limitations, the limitation to the sons, so construed, is capable of conferring a vested interest on the birth of a son living A., or that, if it be not so capable, no practical inconvenience can result from its retaining until the death of A. all the properties of an executory devise or use." [Why stop at the death of A.? why not say boldly "for ever?"] "On the one hand, it might be objected, that the limitation, if considered as capable of vesting in the lifetime of A., would really take effect, according to the known laws of a contingent remainder, and contrary to the known laws of an executory devise or use." [What laws, and by whom known?] "in direct opposition, therefore, to the express enactment of the statute; on the other, that, unless the limitation were considered as capable of vesting in the lifetime of A., this method of protecting contingent remainders would induce serious practical evils. In support of the former objection, the authority of an eminent text-writer might be cited to shew that a limitation, 'from and after the death of A., to the use of his first and other sons,' taking effect otherwise than as a remainder, would not, until the death of A., give a vested estate; but that a son of A. in esse could, living A., have no estate; the limitation would be executory, and confer on him and his heirs a certain fixed right to an estate in possession at a future period." (Butl. Fearn, Cont. Rem. 1, 2 (a)).

As the point here cited from Mr. Butler's note to Fearn contains everything in the way of doubt upon the effect of the repealed enactment which the commentator has been able to bring forward, it may be well, flimsy as it is, to dissect it. The doubt intended to be suggested is, we suppose, whether, under a limitation to A. for life, and after his death to his eldest son in tail, the limitation in tail, considered (in obedience to the act) as in the nature of an executory devise, will give a vested estate to A.'s eldest son immediately on his birth, and in A.'s lifetime, or whether the gift is to be construed literally, as deferred until the death of A.

* What beneficial properties? How beneficial, and to whom, and where mentioned or hinted at in the act?

† It has been objected, that the repealed enactment did not affect vested remainders, and, therefore, that, without inquiring whether a limitation was a contingent or a vested remainder, one might treat a vested remainder as being an executory limitation under the act. This would merely be to arrive at the truth by a circuit, for the rule, that every limitation which may operate as a remainder must do so, is only abolished as to contingent remainders.

It is to be observed, that the question before us relates exclusively to limitations in immediate succession (particular estate and remainder) where the future estate is obviously postponed only for the sake of limiting some immediately antecedent estate. Now, in all cases where, as the phrase is, the postponement of enjoyment is only made "for the convenience of the estate," the perfectly settled rule in the construction of executory gifts is, that words of futurity in the gift do not postpone the vesting. "It may be laid down as a general rule, that, where a testator creates a particular estate, and then goes on to dispose of the ulterior interest expressly in an event which will determine the prior estate, the words descriptive of such event occurring in the latter devise will be construed as referring merely to the period of the determination of the possession or enjoyment under the prior gift, and not as designed to postpone the vesting." (1 Jarman on Wills, 726). It is obvious that the only class of cases to which the repealed enactment could possibly apply is that which comes most plainly and inevitably within this rule. And yet, for the purpose of raising a doubt as to its applicability, we are referred to an opinion of Mr. Butler on the case of an independent limitation of the fee, to take effect "on the 1st of January next," and wholly irrespective of any prior estate created at the same time. But, even in the case of an executory devise in these terms, "after the death of A., I give Whiteacre to A.'s eldest son and his heirs," where A. is tenant for life at the date of the will, it is well known, that, on the death of the testator living A., the eldest son, if in being, will take a vested estate. (See Fearn, C. R. 451; Lytton v. Lytton, 4 Bro. C. C. 441).

The letter proceeds thus: "It may be contended, perhaps, that, as a limitation which is, in its inception, an executory devise or use, may eventually take effect as a remainder; so the limitation in question may, during the suspense of the contingency, be an executory use, and, on the happening of the contingency, vest as a remainder; but the enactment is express that the limitation shall take effect as an executory devise or estate, (i. e. use), and seems to impose the necessity of discovering some mode in which it may vest contrary to the common-law doctrine of remainders."

This, even if intended merely to puzzle the juniors in the pupils' room, would be rather shallow, but, addressed to the Lord Chancellor, on public business, is something worse. The words are, "Every estate which would have taken effect as a contingent remainder shall take effect (if in a will or codicil) as an executory devise, and (if in a deed) as an executory estate of the same nature and having the same properties as an executory devise," i. e. "as an executory estate of the same nature as an executory devise would take effect." The quibble is founded on the perfectly proper ellipsis of the words in italics. According to the author of the letter, it is possible gravely to contend, that the clause refers to estates which would formerly have taken effect in possession, in the same manner as a contingent remainder, while contingent, would take effect, (even on this absurd construction he cannot avoid supplying the ellipsis), and enacts, that henceforth such estates shall take effect in possession, in the same manner as an executory devise, while it remains executory, would take effect in possession!

After this notable criticism, the writer proceeds to state why the commissioners have thought fit to reject so much of the repealed enactment as aims at giving effect to contingent remainders on the happening of the contingency after the natural determination of the particular estate. Having read so far, we thought we were prepared for anything, but the first ground on which the commissioners, "after full discussion and mature consideration," have rejected the provision, startled us. It is this:—

"First, that, admitting the law to be, as regards the cases in question, defective, the mischief is not peculiar to contingent remainders, but, in some degree, at least, affects generally future gifts to classes, of personal as well as of real estate. Thus, if personal estate be limited to A. for life, and after his death to the children of B., and if B. survive A., and have children, some born before and some after A.'s death, the after-born children are excluded; for, though, if there be no child of B. born before A.'s death, the gift will open from time to time, to let in all the after-born children; yet, if there be a child antecedently born, then on A.'s death the gift finally closes. And the same rule applies to even an executory bequest."

We are puzzled to know how to speak of this objection. We might have asked, "Why, if the evil extends to personalty, should not the remedy be extended in like manner?"—if we had not been stopped by the following passage in an earlier part of the letter:—

"Had the case been otherwise, we should not have deemed it consistent with exact or methodical legislation to mix up a detached point as to personal chattels in an act relating to the transfer of real estates."

So that, if there be a mischievous rule of law affecting both real and personal estate, it must just remain untouched, since to amend it as to real estate, and not as to personalty, would be wrong, and to amend it as to both in the same act would be worse. But does the suggested amendment come within this category? Is it quite clear that the rule of tenure requiring that a remainder shall take effect, if at all, immediately on the determination of the particular estate, is exactly analogous to the rule of construction in Devisme v. Mello, (1 Bro. C. C. 536), Odell v. Crone, (3 Dow, 61), &c., determining what persons shall be deemed to have been intended by a general gift to a class? And, granting this to be clear, and it being undeniable that the rule in Devisme v. Mello, &c., extends to executory devises, is it quite clear that an enactment placing contingent remainders in the situation of executory devises in all respects would be a partial interference with the rule in Devisme v. Mello, &c.?

We have now done with this unlucky Letter, and its miserable result. Instances of ignorant and presumptuous legislation are unfortunately too frequent; but the obstruction of the course of legal reform, by such a combination of indolence, petulant carping and interference, blundering without the excuse of ignorance, and incapacity without that of inexperience, as we have just witnessed, proceeding from a source which might well have been expected to combine the most cheerful and enlightened co-operation with the soundest professional learning and discretion, is a spectacle which we believe to be unexampled, and hope will remain unparalleled.

It is clear, from the experience of the last few sessions, that our once boasted system of real property will speedily be reduced to an incoherent heap of legislative crudities, if the task of reform be not at once made worthy of the ambition of first-rate men, by appointing a commission, with instruction to frame a comprehensive scheme,—and worthy of the serious devotion of their time, by giving them a liberal remuneration.

We now turn to the Law Review and Concise Forms. In a well-written article on conveyancing reform, in the last Number of that most unequal periodical*, we find a recommendation of Lord Brougham's Parliamentary Forms, against which we think it our duty to protest. After citing some condemnatory opinions which have been published by Mr. Davidson and Mr. Sweet, the writer says, "We cannot think, however, that these gentlemen can have allowed themselves to do justice to these acts; and we are disposed to think that they are, without knowing it, labouring under an undue bias, as they are severally the editors of extensive and popular collections of precedents, well known in the Profession; and we presume that these collections must now be remodelled." This is,—to compare small things with great,—something like the quarter's salary, for the sake of which Lord John Russell was, according to some people, willing to take office. We shall be curious to see the new collections of precedents "remodelled" upon Lord Brougham's plan, which these gentlemen, after having ineffectually receded their protest, are doubtless engaged in preparing.

After this little inaccuracy in point of taste, the reviewer proceeds thus:—"As we are among those who think that these last two acts are a boon to the Profession," [we agree in this opinion, if the question is to be regarded in the "quarter's salary" point of view, and if, as is said, the parliamentary forms have ever been, or are likely to be, used], "and as we are quite satisfied that they can be employed safely and advantageously in many conveyancing transactions, we have great pleasure in laying before our readers some precedents under the Conveyancing Act, which have been prepared by a learned friend, in whom we have great confidence, as they will best explain the powers of the act; and we would simply add two observations of a practical kind to those given by Mr. Neale:—First, the forms in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 119, are not applicable to a sale alone. They are also most of them applicable to a conveyance by way of mortgage settlement or any other conveyance. Secondly, the practitioner, before he shuts up these acts as useless and impracticable, will do well to consider, whether, if the particular transaction comes within their scope, he will be allowed costs according to the present scale if he does not avail himself of these provisions. This last observation also applies with peculiar force to any attempt, after the 1st January next, to assign a satisfied term." (To any solicitor who troubles himself with the numismatic bearing of the question, we would say, "Try; you will get the smaller fee at all events, and will avoid any concern with the 'skill, labour, and responsibility' incident to the use of the parliamentary form").

The forms given by the reviewer are not happily chosen for the purpose of illustrating his first proposition,—that the act is applicable to other transactions than sales. They are ten in number:—No. 1. "Grant by vendor to purchaser in fee." No. 2. "Grant by vendor seized in fee, and his wife, to purchaser, to uses to bar dower." No. 3. "Grant by devisees and trustee to purchaser in fee." No. 4. "Grant of a wife's estate in fee to purchaser in fee." No. 5. "Grant of a moiety of a messuage to purchaser in fee." No. 6. "Appointment and grant by vendor to purchaser in fee." No. 7. "Grant by mortgagee under a power of sale to purchaser in fee." No. 8. "Grant by joint tenants to purchaser in fee." No. 9. "Reconveyance by mortgagee in fee to mortgagor." No. 10. "Reconveyance by mortgagee in fee to mortgagor by indorsement." Eight conveyances on sales of the simplest description, and two forms of a reconveyance,—no mortgage,—no settlement.

As a specimen of the conciseness which has been attained with the help of the act, we may take No. 9.

"THIS INDENTURE, made the — day of —, 18—, in pursuance of an Act to facilitate the Conveyance of Real Property, Between A. B. [mortgagee], of the one part, and C. D. [mortgagor], of the other part. WHEREAS, by an indenture of release, bearing date &c., and made between &c., in pursuance of the statute for rendering a release as effectual for the conveyance of freehold estates as a lease and release by the same parties, the lands and hereditaments hereinafter described, and intended to be hereby conveyed and assured, with the appurtenances, were conveyed and assured to the use of the said A. B., his heirs and assigns; subject nevertheless to a proviso or agreement in the said indenture now in recital contained for the redemption of the said premises on payment by the said C. D., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, of the sum of £—, with interest for the same after the rate of 5l. for every 100l. by the year, at the time and in the manner in the same indenture mentioned and appointed. AND WHEREAS the said principal sum of £— still remains due and owing upon the security of the said hereinbefore-recited indenture of mortgage, all interest in the said sum having been duly paid and satisfied up to the day of the date of these presents. NOW THIS INDENTURE WITNESSETH, that, in consideration of £— sterling now paid by the said C. D. to the said A. B., the receipt whereof is hereby by him acknowledged, he the said A. B. doth grant Unto the said C. D., his heirs and assigns, for ever, All &c. [parcels]. AND the said A. B. covenants with the said C. D., that he the said A. B. hath done no act to encumber the said premises. IN WITNESS" &c.

A conveyancer who might wish to dispense with the interference of the great Zamiel of law reform in his incantation, and to rely only on the familiar aid of his own dis minores, would frame the charm and do the deed in smaller compass, thus:—

"AN INDENTURE, made on the — day of — 18—, Between A. B., of the one part, and C. D., of the other part. WHEREAS, by indenture made on the — day of —, between &c., the hereditaments hereinafter described were conveyed to the use of the said A. B. in fee, by way of mortgage, for securing payment to him, his executors, administrators, or assigns, by the said C. D., his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, of £—, with interest, which principal and interest monies have this day been paid. NOW THIS INDENTURE WITNESSETH, that the said A. B. grants All [parcels], with their appurtenants, and all his estate and interest therein, Unto and to the use of the said C. D. and his heirs; AND, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenants with the said C. D. and his heirs, that the said A. B. hath not been party or privy to any incumbrance on the premises. IN WITNESS" &c.

The forms before us, taken in connexion with the act of Parliament, are sufficiently open to serious criticism; but our business is not with the miserable details of the two ill-drawn and abortive acts which now exist as a snare for the unwary, but with the general principle upon which they are framed, and the extension of which to every branch of conveyancing, by a host of similar crudities, is threatened. The Legal Review says—

"The commencement of the change is not a small one, but it must proceed, and from present appearances we are inclined to think, that, if the public did not call for it, the Profession would. It will demand, that any benefit that can be obtained from a complete series of acts, on the plan of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 119, shall be placed at the option of the practitioner. Nothing less than this will now satisfy the demand. It may be delayed by various causes: interest will have its sneer; ignorance will have its laugh; and still more the desire to spend life easily and quietly, and with as little trouble as possible, may retard the taking the necessary steps; but many years—probably many months—will not be allowed to elapse without further progress in this direction."

Should this threat be carried into execution, we hope that the results will be printed separately in the various editions of the Statutes at Large, for the convenience of such members of the Profession as may not wish to invest money in the purchase of "Precedents in Conveyancing, by Lord Brougham & Co."

Our objections to the principle thus avowed are so pointedly and happily expressed by Mr. Joshua Williams, that we shall cite his words, without any comment:—

"It is quite evident, that, in the above-mentioned acts, the columns containing the short sentences either express the same ideas as the corresponding columns containing the long sentences, or they express ideas in a greater or less degree different. If they express the same ideas, then it is equally evident that the acts are altogether superfluous, for there would clearly be no occasion to enact that one sentence, which means the same thing as another, should be considered, by authority of Parliament, as having the same meaning. If, however, the columns containing the short sentences do not express the same ideas as the columns which contain the long sentences, then the following very great inconvenience arises: the sentences used in deeds executed under these acts will not express the same meaning as the same sentences in every other place, [and even in other parts of the same deed] and a new legal language will, in fact, be formed. Every science has its technical terms; but these terms are seldom such as are employed elsewhere, and the difficulty of acquiring them is more than counterbalanced by the precision which they impart. Of such terms the law has an abundance, consisting both of words and of short phrases. But the acts in question are an attempt to introduce not merely technical words and technical phrases, but whole sentences with a technical meaning; and this technical meaning they are to possess notwithstanding that they are pure English sentences, and have long enjoyed a meaning of another kind, and are still allowed to possess that meaning elsewhere. If the two acts which have already passed should (as it is to be hoped) be the only acts of the kind, the mischief that will arise will be of no great importance, for they are adapted only to very simple cases, and it is not probable that they will be generally used. But, if the contemplated scheme for adapting these schedules to deeds of all kinds should ever come into operation, the mischief likely to be produced is incalculable. In reading such a deed, a struggle would constantly be felt between the natural English meaning of the sentence and the unnatural parliamentary construction. The labours of the Profession would be enormously increased, for every lawyer would be obliged to perfect himself in the new language; without it he could not possibly comprehend the meaning of any deed; and there can be little doubt, that, in the preparation of such deeds, an amount of skill and labour would be required, as well as a responsibility incurred, far greater than is now the case; and the public, paying for such skill, labour, and responsibility, would be proportionally injured. The work of the hand would, no doubt, be diminished; but the more expensive labour of the head would be greatly increased. The English language sufficiently possesses in itself the desired qualities of perspicuity and conciseness. Let a man but possess clear ideas, and, whatever be his subject, the English language will afford him means of clear and concise expression. If any proof be needed that the subjects with which the art of conveyancing is conversant afford no exception to the general rule, reference might be made to the numerous collections of concise precedents which from time to time have issued from the press. On all these precedents the acts in question tend to cast discredit; for it is evident that the Legislature considers the verbose sentences in the second column to be replete with meaning, and, by applying the extraordinary power of Parliament to their compression, it seems to imply that they cannot be sufficiently and satisfactorily condensed by any ordinary means. The style of deeds used in ordinary practice is certainly verbose, but it is gradually growing less so, notwithstanding that a direct premium is given to verbosity; first, by a scale of remuneration greatly inadequate; and, secondly, by that scale being regulated only by length. Hold out some inducement to brevity, instead of giving a premium to verbosity, and the style of legal instruments will soon become quite as concise as accuracy will admit. The provision in the acts, that the deeds shall be charged for according to the skill and labour employed, and the responsibility incurred, is so far an effort in the right direction, and it is to be hoped that the time may come when professional remuneration generally shall more nearly follow the same rule*."

Mr. Williams's criticism on the act to render the assignment of satisfied terms unnecessary forms so striking an exception to the general soundness of his remarks on the recent statutes, that we should have hesitated to receive it as the work of the same pen, if the subject had not been one which belongs to the superstitions of conveyancing. We understand that a gallant band of quixotic conveyancers has organised itself into a humane society, for the express purpose of preserving, by means of an act to be obtained, all terms from future merger, and for resuscitating, by the same agency, those which have been included in the noyades of the 31st December, 1845. These gentlemen seriously maintain that there can be no honest, safe, or satisfactory dealing with "unattended" estates: whether they go so far as to reject all such estates as unmarketable, we have not ascertained. One eccentric practitioner has devoted himself to the manufacture of terms of years, which, he flatters himself, can never be satisfied—terms originally and expressly created for the sole purposes of attending the inheritance. These insatiable terms he considers as beyond the jurisdiction of Lord Brougham's acts, and, though mere nursery seedlings at present, as likely to afford shelter and protection in future ages to troops of happy and grateful purchasers and mortgagees,—sua si bona norint. Mr. Williams does not run into these extravagances; but his evident eagerness to find fault with the statute has caused him to be satisfied with arguments which his unbiassed judgment would never have tolerated. After explaining the nature of attendant terms, and labouring very needlessly to prove that a term of seven and a term of one thousand years are of the same nature in law, and that the reversions in fee expectant on such terms respectively possess the same incidents, (in illustration of which undeniable postulate, he uses a most incorrect mathematical proposition†), he puts the case of a settlement under which A. is merely tenant for life, and X. remainder-man in fee, an attendant term having been left unappropriated. "A., professing to be owner of the fee, sells to B., and the term is assigned to B., as trustee for the protection of B., A. being still alive. The act now passes. The term of years is evidently one attendant on the reversion by express declaration, within the meaning of the act, and the act enacts, that it shall absolutely cease, except that, although made to cease, it shall afford to every person the same protection as it would have afforded him if it had continued to subsist, and shall, for the purpose of such protection, be considered in every court of law and of equity to be a subsisting term. After what has been said, the reader will have little difficulty in perceiving that this enactment carries contradiction on the face of it. If the term be merged, then it cannot subsist in law; and if it subsist in law, then it cannot be merged. It is evident, that, in the example we have given, B.'s protection, when A. is dead, will essentially consist in the duration of the term in its length and breadth, and with all its accompanying attributes. If the term cease but for a moment, B.'s protection is gone for ever, and if B.'s protection is to be available at law, then the term must, for the remainder of the thousand years, still continue to be vested in his trustee. Surely, the Legislature did not intend to deprive B. of any part of his protection; and, if this be the case, then the act, in this instance, stultifies itself, and becomes a nullity."

† Viz. that " $7 + \alpha = 1000 + \alpha$." If so, and if, as we presume Mr. Williams, in his view of the force of the symbol α , will admit, (though we do not), it be true, that $\alpha = \alpha$, then, as the results of the subtraction of equals from equals must be equal, $7 + \alpha - \alpha = 1000 + \alpha - \alpha$; $\therefore 7 = 1000$. Scholium:—In the same manner any number may be proved to be equal to any other number.

We are at a loss to understand how a writer, possessing, as we have seen, no small command over the resources of the "pure English" tongue for elegant and lucid exposition, could have thus shut his eyes to the plain meaning of words and the use of language. He assumes that terms of years, instead of being mere fictions of the brain, subject to the dominion of the imagination exclusively, are tangible realities, like stone columns or brick walls, and amenable only to the laws of nature. An enactment that all brick walls should be pulled down, but, notwithstanding such destruction, should, for certain purposes, remain standing, would doubtless deserve the compliment contained in the above extract; but the enactment that courts of law shall in future take no notice of those idealities called terms of years, except only in such cases and to such extent as may be necessary for the purpose of securing to all persons at present deriving any protection from them the future enjoyment of such protection, so far from being a foolish nullity, appears to us to be a most wise and important amendment of the law operating infallibly and beneficially upon all terms which were satisfied when the act was past. The only omission which can fairly be charged upon the framers of the act is, that they did not provide against the perverse ingenuity of those few bigoted conveyancers, who, by taking advantage of such quibbles as can be raised upon the word "satisfied," may possibly succeed in future in creating and keeping alive a few specimens of these obnoxious estates until they are swept away by some new enactment. The act might, in our opinion, with proper provisions as to the production of title-deeds, &c., have been beneficially extended to unsatisfied terms, and, indeed, to the legal estate, as a means of protection, in every case; but a measure involving so extensive an attack upon old prejudices would have met with certain defeat, and, therefore, we cannot see the justice of the objection which is founded on the limited operation of the present act. To return to Mr. Williams:—

"The incumbrance, however, created by A., and against which the term of years vested in B. is to protect B., may not extend to the whole; for sample, thus: A. may, upon his marriage, have merely granted a rent-charge, by way of jointure, to his intended wife (whom we may call Y.) for her life, in case she should survive him. If now Y. should be living at the time of the passing of the act, the existence of the term will still be as necessary to afford to B. protection at law against the claim of Y., as it would have been to afford protection at law against the claim of X.; but, after Y.'s decease, such protection will not be required, and the merger of the term after that time might take place without any diminution of B.'s protection. The merger, however, which takes place under the act, is confined to a single day, namely, the 31st December, 1845, and, if the act has not merged the term on that day, it contains no provision for its merger at any subsequent date, for the second section of the act is clearly inapplicable to this case. Whether, therefore, the incumbrance against which the protection is to subsist extends to the whole fee simple or be merely a partial interest, it seems equally to follow, that, if such incumbrance is existing on the 31st December, 1845, the term must continue to subsist at law; and, if it escape the destruction inflicted on that day, it will still remain as subsisting as before."

The author of the above passage must surely be referring to some other enactment than that which lies before us,—an enactment saying, as plainly as words can convey a meaning, that all satisfied terms existing on the 31st December, 1845, shall then cease; nevertheless, whenever any person claims the benefit of the protection from any such term to which he or one through whom he claims was entitled on that day, courts of law shall, to the extent only of affording such protection, disregard this enactment as to the cesser of such term.

With singular perversity, the writer contrasts with the act in question the ordinary form for merger of terms adopted in railway acts, that all attendant terms shall merge, "but shall in equity afford the same protection as if they had been kept on foot and assigned" &c., as an example of consistent and intelligible legislation. Now, we have little doubt that the courts would take care that these enactments should not fail of effect, but they are unquestionably, if taken literally, absurd and inoperative. Outstanding legal estates afford no protection in equity; the essence of their operation is, that they protect at law, and that equity stands passive. To enact, therefore, that they shall cease at law, but shall, in equity, afford the same protection as formerly, is mere nonsense.

In answer to the question, "What is to be done with outstanding terms?" we shall report, for the benefit of our junior readers, a dialogue in chambers:—

"Tiro.—Here are nine attendant terms on this abstract. What is to be done with them? Seven have been assigned each about ten times during the last twelve years, although six of the seven appear to have been merged in 1820 by an injudicious assignment to the same trustee; most of them, too, were created with a proviso for cesser.

"Eunomus.—The rogues! Some practitioners cannot see a merger. But why trouble yourself with them? You can do nothing now with a satisfied term.

"Ti.—But suppose they are not quite satisfied?

"Eu.—That may make a difference. You must bear in mind the distinction between dealings with terms before the commencement of 1846 and dealings after that moment. Whatever has been done before the present year, in the way of securing protection, will remain as effectual as if Lord Brougham's act had not passed. Anything now attempted to be done with a satisfied term will be simply nugatory. If the term is not satisfied, its first office will be to secure the objects for which it was created, and which are unfulfilled. While any such object remains, the term will remain unsatisfied, and unaffected by the act. So long, then, as a term continues as to any part, however insignificant, of its original trusts, truly and bona fide unsatisfied, the same scramble for protection from it which could formerly have happened, consistently with the paramount trust, may still take place; but with this difference in the result—that the protection will be commensurate, not, as formerly, with the duration of the term, but only with the duration of the original trusts and objects of the term. When these are finally satisfied, the term is satisfied, and ceases under the 2nd section of the act. For such a limited protection, it will seldom be possible, and still seldomer worth while, to struggle.

"Ti.—I have heard that some practitioners propose, in order to keep the system on foot, that, when the time arrives for paying the money secured by a term, a penny or a shilling should be left unpaid, so as not fully to satisfy the trusts.

Eu.—The ingenuity of these gentlemen is not much greater than their wisdom. If the trusts escape being released in the process, (which is most likely to happen), they are sure to be soon extinguished by the Statute of Limitations, or the doctrine of presumption. No court would countenance such follies. In the meantime the 'protected' would be much at the mercy of one of his protectors—not the trustee of the term, but the trustee, so to speak, of the penny.

Ti.—But suppose, that, at the commencement of the present year, the term should be vested in a trustee, in trust as a further security for a mortgagee of the fee, or a mortgagee by demise, and, subject thereto, in trust to attend the inheritance?

Eu.—The original trusts of the term being, of course, satisfied? The term would then be a satisfied term within the 1st section*. That it was held in trust to protect not a simple unencumbered fee vested in one person, but the various subdivided interests of several persons in the fee, or only the partial interest of one person in a portion of the fee, can make no difference. Quoad the objects for which it was created, the term is satisfied; and, until it became a point of honour to pick holes in every beneficial reform, no one attributed any other meaning to the phrase. But, whether conveyancers understand the word in this sense, or not, it is clear that it is so used in the act; for a term assigned 'in trust to attend the inheritance or reversion' is expressly doomed to destruction as a 'satisfied' term. Now, a trust to attend and protect a purchaser of the inheritance is just as real and substantial a trust as a trust to attend and protect an incumbrancer on the inheritance; and if the existence of the former trust will not save the term from annihilation, as being satisfied, that of the latter cannot do so. And if this were not so, the term would, at all events, become satisfied on the discharge of the protected incumbrance.

Ti.—Then, do you conclude that all terms are in future to be neglected in conveyancing?

Eu.—The satisfaction of the objects for which a term was created must, of course, be looked to, as heretofore, and also the possibility of feats of legerdemain being performed with it, for purposes of protection, while it continues unsatisfied and in existence. With regard to terms which were attendant at the close of the last year, one object, which was formerly attained by calling for an actual assignment, must now be sought for in a different way; namely, an assurance that the term has not been (before 1846) assigned for the benefit of some latent and prior claimant or incumbrancer. An assignment by the apparent trustee for the time being, with a covenant that he had not encumbered, afforded a sufficient guarantee that no such appropriation had been made in his time; and now, though an actual assignment is out of the question, yet, if the apparent trustee of 1845 is living, he should be required to give an equivalent in the shape of a distinct assurance that he has not been party to any concealed alienation or incumbrance.

Ti.—Why not take the safe course of executing assignments as heretofore?

Eu.—Because it is your duty to your client not to waste his money; your duty to the public to aid, and not to obstruct, amendment; and your duty to yourself not to make a fool of yourself. If a conveyancer, after careful deliberation, concludes that the act has not effected its purpose, I can only wonder at him; but if, without having so arrived at such a conclusion, and from indolence merely, or timidity, he resolves to follow the old course, because it is safe, he has mistaken his vocation, and should quit a profession for which he is not morally qualified. Solicitors attempting to keep up this profitable farce of protection may be speedily brought to their senses by an appeal to the taxing Master." G. S.

RAILWAY COMPANIES AND ALLOTTEES.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE JURIST.

Sir,—In a late article in THE JURIST, (Vol. 9, p. 489), you treated of the recovery of deposits by railway companies from the allottees of shares, and you therein express an opinion, that, in many cases, such companies have a remedy in equity.

It appears to me, that, at law, the deposits may generally be recovered, and that the difficulties in the way of such recovery are not in reality so great as they have appeared to the learned Solicitor-General.

I say "generally" be recovered, because, of course, where there has been fraud, or any material deviation from the terms of the contract, the remedy cannot be enforced. But this is no peculiarity applicable to allotments of shares alone; it applies to all cases of contract, and, therefore, should not be imported into the abstract question of enforcing allotment-agreements.

The general course has been for the applicant to write to the provisional committee for shares, agreeing to pay the deposits when required, and to sign the necessary documents. The shares (or, rather, a title thereto) are then allotted usually by the managing committee, and the allottee is required to pay the deposits and sign the parliamentary deed by a certain day. Now, the question is, if the allottee neglect to pay the deposits, can an action be successfully maintained against him at the suit of the provisional committee?

First, I would submit, this is a valid agreement. The letter of application is in the nature of an offer or proposal; the letter of allotment is an acceptance of such offer. But it is objected, the acceptance of the offer is not by the party to whom the proposal is made: the allotment is by the managing committee, whereas the application was to the provisional committee. It seems a sufficient answer to this objection to observe, that the managing committee form a section or part of the provisional committee: they are partners with the provisional committee and act for them, and as their agents. The provisional committee, then, allot the shares by the managing committee.

If an order be sent to a merchant, and be assented to by his agent, would it be contended that the rule, "Qui facit per alium facit per se," would not apply? And so, if the active members of a firm enter into a contract for the purposes of the partnership, it is not invalidated because the dormant partners were not parties to it, although the proposal for such contract may have been addressed to the firm generally.

It may also be remarked, that the applicant in most cases has the means of knowing who are the members of the managing committee at the time he applies, for they are usually formed about the same time as the provisional committee, and appear together with them in the prospectus. He must be taken also to know their duties. When he applies to the provisional committee, he applies also to that which is a part of and contained within them, the managing committee.

Secondly, as to the remedy at common law. The first question would be, is the allottee a partner together with the provisional committee, so as to prevent them from suing him at law? I think it is clear that he is not a partner; the application and allotment form an agreement to enter into a partnership, the capital of which is to consist of a certain sum, and the objects of which are to be effectually attained by an act of Parliament. He has no right to participate in any profits, at all events, before he has paid the deposit on the allotment. In Fox v. Clifton, (6 Bing. 776), it appeared that the "Imperial Distillery Company" had issued a prospectus, stating that the affairs of the company were managed by a board of directors, that a deed of settlement would be prepared forthwith, that application was intended to be made to Parliament for an act, and that the shares would be forthwith allotted. It will be seen how closely analogous this prospectus is to the prospectus of a railway company. It was held by the Court of Common Pleas, that a subscriber to the above distillery company was not a partner, although he had paid the requisite deposits, but that he had merely assented to become a partner in a company, raising a certain capital, and to be governed by a deed, and that he had no right to participate in the profits. "We think," said Tindal, C. J., in delivering judgment, "if the right to participate in the profits of a joint concern is to be taken, as undoubtedly it ought to be, as a test of partnership, these defendants were not entitled at any time to demand a share of profits, if profits had been made, inasmuch as they had never fulfilled the conditions upon which they subscribed."

As to the parties to the action, the provisional committee, including, of course, the managing committee, should be the plaintiffs, on the ground already adverted to, that they stand in the relation of active or ostensible and dormant partners, who may always join in an action on a contract made by the active partners. (Leveck v. Skafes, 2 Esp. 468; Barnden v. Howell, 4 Scott, N. R., 331).

Supposing an action of assumpsit to be brought on the agreement contained in the letters, and the general issue only to be pleaded, it is next to be seen what practical difficulties would oppose the plaintiffs at the trial. In the first place it would be necessary for the plaintiffs to procure the letter of application in their possession to be stamped. Where an agreement consists of several letters, it is sufficient, by 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, (sched., part 1), if any one of such letters be stamped. (And see Hemming v. Perry, 2 M. & P. 375).

The penalty for stamping an agreement, consisting of not more than 1080 words, after fourteen days from its being entered into, is now, by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 21, increased from 5*l.* to 10*l.*; and, as this sum would not be allowed in costs to the plaintiffs, even though successful, they will probably be deterred from suing any but those against whom they feel assured of having a good case, and from whom they may reasonably expect their damages and costs, in the event of success.

The original letter of application being in the possession of the plaintiffs, they will give the defendant notice to admit the handwriting, and, in default of such admission, they must prove it at the trial.

The original letter of allotment being in the hands of the defendant, he should be served with a notice to produce it. The probabilities are certainly against his compliance with this notice, and, in that event, the plaintiffs must be prepared to prove a copy, verified as such, and to shew that the defendant received the original. I have heard it objected, that, although the receipt of notices of dishonour and the like may be presumed, from evidence of their having been put into the post, yet that, where it is sought to prove so essential a part of an agreement as the acceptance of the proposal, stronger evidence will be required.

But surely this is confounding the rules of evidence with the nature of the documents to be proved. The law having recognised, as a general principle, that proof of having put a letter into the post-office shall be prima facie evidence of the receipt thereof, the same principle should apply, whatever may be the contents of the letter. To be allowed, in any case, it must be some evidence to go to the jury, and it is the best that can be procured in by far the majority of instances.

Such, it appears to me, will be the course to be adopted by railway committees. If the defendant has any special matters of defence, they must be alleged and proved by him.

On a review of the whole question, therefore, the conclusion I arrive at is, that, in general, there are not insuperable difficulties in the way of companies enforcing their remedy at law, though, doubtless, practical difficulties will arise in many cases on their own special circumstances.

I am, Sir,

Temple,
Jan. 22, 1846.

Your obedient servant,
H. M.

A. Maxwell & Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn; H. Sweet, 1 and 3, Chancery-lane; and V. and R. Stevens & G. S. Norton, 26 and 29, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

Of whom may be had, recently published,

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 6l. 10s. in strong cloth bds., BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE AND PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Exeter District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of those Statutes the executive power of the Magistracy has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner Bere; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superceding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fullness of the Marginal Note.

Several Assurance Offices belong exclusively to Lawyers, and the advantages of their connexion are acknowledged, but those advantages have hitherto been confined to the Shareholders.

It is one of the objects of this Institution to place the Benefits arising from this connexion within the reach of every Member of the Profession in the United Kingdom, whether he be a Shareholder or not.

Another and paramount object is to give the Assured perfect security at the most moderate cost, and to afford them the Advantages, without the risks, of Mutual Assurance.

The Public will have the option of assuring either upon a scale entitling them to participate in the Profits, or upon a lower scale, without profits.

Four fifths of the Profits from Assurances upon the higher scale will be divided periodically among the Assured; and one fifth will be carried to a Fund, comprising all the profits accruing to the Society from other sources.

The first charge upon this Fund will be the payment of Interest, at the rate of 4*l.* per cent. per annum to the Shareholders, upon the amount of the Capital paid up; then a portion of the surplus (not exceeding one tenth) will be applied in aid of a Widows' and Orphans' Fund, or Nominee Society, for the benefit of the Widows and Families of Members of the Profession; and of the residue one moiety will be divided amongst the Shareholders, and the other moiety between the Solicitors through whose means Assurances are effected.

The attention of the Profession is earnestly invited to the principles of this Society, which combine perfect security to the Assured, with advantages to the Profession superior to those afforded by the existing Law Assurance Offices.

The Society will transact every species of business usually undertaken by Life Assurance Companies; and the utmost care will be taken to render the arrangement of this Office satisfactory to the Profession and the Public.

A Table of Premiums is in course of preparation, and will shortly be published.

Some Shares remain to be allotted, or which application, in the usual form, may be made to the Secretary.

LONDON, JANUARY 31, 1846.

We think we may venture to say, without disrespect to those members of the Profession who do not practise in the common law courts, that difficulties not uncommonly arise in seeking legal remedies upon deeds or other instruments, from the framers of them not having been conversant with the doctrines of those courts. It is one of the evils necessarily attendant upon the division of labour which everywhere prevails, but it becomes these pages, devoted as they are to the Profession generally, to endeavour to counteract this tendency, and we, therefore, in our present Number, present to the notice of our readers, especially of those of the class to which we have alluded, the following decisions of courts of common law respecting the construction of covenants:—

In Eccleston v. Cliphaw, (1 W. Saund. 153), it was held, that, though a covenant be joint and several in the terms of it, yet, if the interest and cause of action be joint, the action must be brought by all the covenantees. And, on the other hand, if the interest and cause of action be several, the action may be brought by one only. This rule has been followed in a variety of cases, which may all be found referred to in the notes to the above case; and the general rule established by them is, that, wherever the interest of the covenantees is joint, although the covenant be in terms joint and several, the action follows the nature of the interest, and must be brought in the names of all the covenantees; but, where the interest of the covenantees is several, they may maintain separate actions, though the language of the covenant be joint. In a note to Shep. Touch. 166, Mr. Preston, observing upon this rule, and upon the language of Sir Vicary Gibbs in James v. Emery, (5 Price, 533), lays down as the correct rule, that, by express words, clearly indicative of the intention, a covenant may be joint or joint and several to or with the covenantors or covenantees, notwithstanding the interests are several,—so they may be several, although the interests are joint. But the implication or construction of law when the words are ambiguous, or are left to the interpretation of law, will be, that the words have an import corresponding to the interest, so as to be joint when the interest is joint, and several when the interest is several; notwithstanding language, which, under different circumstances, would give to the covenant a different effect.

In Sorsbie v. Park, (12 Mee. & W. 146; 13 Law Journ., N. S., Exch., 9), this qualification of Mr. Preston of the rule above noticed was brought before the Court of Exchequer, and adopted by that court. "I think the rule," said one of the judges, "is plain and certain, and requires no authority; it is correctly stated by Mr. Preston, in the passage in Sheppard's Touchstone which Mr. Temple has cited. Where the words of a covenant are in their nature ambiguous, so that they may be construed either way, then the deed in which they are inserted supplies the mode of their construction. If it exhibit a several interest in the parties, you may construe it as a several covenant, and vice versa. But there is no rule to say, that words, which are expressly a joint covenant by several persons, shall be construed as a several covenant, unless there is something to lead to that construction." And another, "I think the correct rule is laid down by Gibbs, C. J., in the case of James v. Emery, with the qualification stated by Mr. Preston, in the note in Sheppard's Touchstone, 166. That rule is, that a covenant will be construed to be joint or several according to the interest of the parties appearing upon the face of the deed, if the words are capable of that construction; not that it will be construed to be several by reason of several interests if it be expressly joint."

WS PAPER

In Mills v. Ladbrooke, (7 M. & G. 218; 7 Scott, 1005; 8 Jur. 247; 13 Law Journ., N. S., C. P., 122), Mr. Preston's qualification of the rule was adverted to by the court, but without assent or dissent, as the case was capable of decision, assuming the rule to be unqualified. In more recent cases, however, the correctness has been directly brought in issue, and the result, as we apprehend, has been to establish the unqualified rule.

But a short time before the decision of Sorsbie v. Park, the Court of Queen's Bench had, in its judgment in Foley v. Addenbrooke (4 Q. B. Rep. 197; 3 G. & D. 64; 7 Jur. 234; 13 Law Journ., N. S., Q. B., 163), recognised the result of the cases as being as before stated, without noticing the qualification of Mr. Preston, but to which, indeed, their attention had not been called. The case, therefore, is not entitled to be considered as of much importance.

But Hopkinson v. Lee (14 Law Journ., N. S., Q. B., 101; 9 Jur. 616) is of a different character, coming after the decision of the Court of Exchequer, and expressly passing judgment upon it. In that case the words of the covenant were, "That the defendant and T. M. Lee, in consideration of the premises and of the advance of the sum of 2000*l.*, covenanted with the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and also as a separate and distinct covenant with and to the said A. C. Hogg, his executors, administrators, and assigns, in manner following; that is to say," &c. It was contended for the defendant, that the plaintiff ought to have joined A. C. Hogg in the action, she having, as appeared to be the fact, an interest in the common fund. Sorsbie v. Park was cited and relied upon for the plaintiff; and the correctness of the qualification introduced by Mr. Preston, and recognised by the judges in that case, was denied by the Court of Queen's Bench, who directed a nonsuit to be entered. We quote that part of the judgment which is more particularly applicable to the point in question:—

Lord Denman, C. J.—"The question in this case was, whether a nonsuit ought to be entered on account of the action being brought by the plaintiff only, when the covenant in contemplation of law was said to be made by the defendant with the plaintiff and one Anne Caroline Hogg jointly. That it is so made is argued upon the authority of a very long series of cases, of which Slingsby's case (5 Rep. 18 b, 19 a) is the leading one, and although by no means the oldest case, yet more entitled to respect, because founded on principle; the reason of which is adopted, sanctioned, and fully explained by Lord Kenyon, in Anderson v. Martindale, (1 East, 497), who comments upon it, and whose subsequent decision received the silent acquiescence of the whole court. This case does not appear to have been overruled or questioned. It was acted upon in the court of error, over which Gibbs, C. J., presided, in 1818, in James v. Emery, (5 Price, 533; S. C., 8 Taunt. 215). The same rule is laid down in Shepard's Touchstone, p. 166; but the last very learned editor of that work (Mr. Preston) has there originated a doubt whether it is not expressed too generally. He refers to several cases, none of which impugn or qualify the rule; and, what is truly remarkable, he does not even name Anderson v. Martindale. Mr. Preston introduces an exception, not grounded on judicial authority, namely, that the covenants must be ambiguous, before that which is prima facie either joint or several can be properly construed as several or joint, according to the interest of a covenantee. He cites Salkeld, p. 393, which gives no countenance to the exception; and he cites 2 Rolle's Abridgment, p. 419, which relates to a wholly different matter. We have looked into not only the second, but the first, Rolle's Abridgment, p. 419, which is under the title 'Condition,' and also at p. 519, which comprises the head of 'Covenant;' but in neither place does this doctrine at all appear. Mr. Preston thus concludes his observations: 'The general rule proposed by Sir Vicary Gibbs, and to be found in several books, would establish that there was a rule of law too powerful to be controlled by an intention, however express.' But we think that there is no ground for Mr. Preston's apprehension, that words perfectly plain and unambiguous, confining the contract expressly to one person, and excluding all others from its operation, will be strained by the law so as to comprehend those whom it took pains to exclude. The true explanation of the rule is rather this: that the whole covenant, taken together, extends to both covenantees, and not to either of them, although separately named in some of its words, by reason of the joint interest of the subject-matter of the action appearing on the face of the covenant itself. Such being the state of authorities, a special case was reserved from the assizes for the Court of Exchequer, where certain persons with whom a covenant had been made sued the covenantees upon it. The deed, being fully set out, was found to make the defendants covenant with the plaintiffs for themselves and others; and, in Easter Term, 1843, the court held, in strict conformity with all the cases, that a nonsuit ought to be entered, because all the others had not been joined as plaintiffs in bringing the action, although the covenant declared on was made with the plaintiffs alone. But the plaintiff here founds his argument upon some dicta which fell from the late Lord Chief Baron and from Mr. Baron Parke, applicable not to that case, but only to the converse of it, which was represented as at variance with the old law. Unluckily, no reference was made to Anderson v. Martindale; and the court, justly thinking the case too clear for argument, stopped the learned counsel who supported it. Lord Abinger thought the rule plain and certain, and that it required no authority, observing, however, 'it is correctly stated by Mr. Preston,' and then he cites the rule, with the exception. Baron Parke also thinks the correct rule is laid down by Gibbs, C. J., in James v. Emery; still, however, with the qualification stated by Mr. Preston. These learned judges could not intend to overrule Anderson v. Martindale, which was not brought before them; nor, if they did, could we agree to be bound, by their extra-judicially declaring such intention, when their decision itself pursued the decision in that case."

The Court of Queen's Bench, therefore, dissents from the dicta in Sorsbie v. Park, and adheres to the law laid down in the old cases, without the qualification introduced by Mr. Preston.

The above judgment has been brought before the Court of Exchequer in a still later case, Bradburn v.

Bafield, (14 Law J., N. S., Ex., 330); and that court has explained what was meant by the dicta in Sorsbie v. Park, and, in effect, confirmed the doctrine held by the Court of Queen's Bench. "I mention this," says Baron Parke, who delivered the judgment, "because the Court of Queen's Bench, in the case of Hopkinson v. Lee, have supposed that Lord Abinger and myself had sanctioned some doctrine at variance with the case of Anderson v. Martindale and Slingsby's case, which was far from my intention to do, it being lawfully established, I conceive, by the cases that one and the same covenant cannot be made both joint and several with the covenantors and covenantees. It may be fit to observe that a part of Mr. Preston's explanation, that, by express words, a covenant may be joint and several with the covenantor or covenantees, notwithstanding the interests are several, is inaccurately expressed: it is true only of covenantors, and the case cited from Salkeld (p. 393) relates to them. Probably Mr. Preston intended no more; and I never meant to assent to the doctrine that the same covenant might be made by any words, however strong, joint and several, where the interest was joint."

The most important part, therefore, of the qualification is to be rejected; and, if Mr. Preston meant to speak of the covenantees, and it is clear, from his language, that he did, he was undoubtedly wrong. And, with respect to covenantors, the qualification was needless, as the judgment of Sir Vicary Gibbs, and the cases upon which it was founded, had reference to the parties bringing the action, and not to those against whom it was to be brought.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL EDUCATION,

APPOINTED TO INQUIRE, BY THE PARLIAMENT OF THE MIDDLE TEMPLE.

At a Parliament holden on the 21st November, 1845, a motion having been made by Master Bethell, of which the notice was as follows, viz.:—

That, for promoting the legal education of the students of this House, it is expedient that a lecturer be appointed for the purpose of reading on jurisprudence and the civil law; and that two or more exhibitions be founded for the benefit of such students as shall, on examination previous to their call to the Bar, shew the greatest proficiency in the subjects of such lectures; and that such lectures be open to the attendance of students of the other Inns of Court; and that, from and after the first day of Easter Term, 1846, no student of this House be called to the Bar who shall not have attended one of such terminal course of lectures; and that the societies of the other Inns be requested to concur with this society in the establishment of similar lectureships in other branches of law; and that it be referred to a committee to approve of proper regulations for carrying the above objects into effect.

It was resolved and ordered by the Bench,—

"That it is expedient that steps be taken for promoting the legal education of the students of this House; and that it be referred to a committee to ascertain and report to the Bench the best mode of carrying this resolution and the objects mentioned in the above notice of motion into effect."

Under the aforesaid order, the committee have made the following report:—

TO THE PARLIAMENT, &c.

Your committee having entered on the inquiry directed to them, as to the means to be adopted "for promoting the legal education of the students," recommend that the steps to be taken by the Middle Temple should be such as are best adapted for the commencement of a sound and comprehensive legal education; for they have reason to hope that the plan, thus rightly begun, will be followed out and completed by the proceedings of the other societies; so that the institutions which will be finally established by the several Inns shall afford to the students collectively a complete course of legal instruction. The committee have also adverted to the acknowledged deficiency which has long been felt to exist in the education of English lawyers, in consequence of their entire neglect of the study of jurisprudence and the civil law; although, in all places where law has been or is taught as a science, these subjects have uniformly formed the first and one of the most essential parts of legal education. From these, and many other reasons to the like effect, the committee are induced to recommend that the first step for the promotion of legal education to be taken by this House should be the appointment of a reader on jurisprudence and the civil law. To illustrate the benefits which, in the view of the committee, would result to the legal education of the students from such an appointment, it may be well to explain the sense in which the committee use the terms "civil law" and "jurisprudence," and their consequent expectation of the province and duties of the lecturer.

By the term "jurisprudence" the committee mean to indicate general jurisprudence, as distinguished from the particular jurisprudence of any individual nation; and which, in further explanation of their meaning, they would divide into positive jurisprudence, or the philosophy of positive law, and comparative jurisprudence, or the exhibition of the principles of positive law in an embodied form, by a comparison of the jurisprudence of modern nations. In the first, they would have the lecturer also include the important subject of the "Interpretation of Laws;" and, under the latter head of comparative jurisprudence, the "Conflict of Laws" may, with propriety, be comprised.

By the term "civil law" the committee wish to indicate what may be called "Modern Roman Law," that is to say, those portions of the civil law which, being of an universal character, and applicable to the relations of modern society, have formed the basis of the jurisprudence of many continental nations, and entered so largely into our own.

The committee are of opinion that this study of the theory of the civil law may be most advantageously combined with the study of jurisprudence, and that the two united will furnish the best means of preparatory legal culture, and the formation of an enlarged and comprehensive legal mind.

In lecturing on this subject, the committee recommend that the lecturer should read with the class, first, the greater part of the Institutes, and then portions of the Pandects, accompanying that which is read with an exposition of the subject, tracing the rules and principles in the jurisprudence of modern nations, and more especially in that of our own country.

The committee believe that this plan, if properly carried out, will be of the greatest advantage to students in the commencement of their studies; and that the transition, which they desire should be constantly made, from the principles of the civil law to corresponding portions of English law, and the cases and judgments in the latter, which are most illustrative either of the agreement or differences of the two systems, will effectually tend to ground the students in a right apprehension of the principles of many of the most important portions of English law, as now practically administered. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that, to students intended for the equity bar, (and which now form a large proportion), this is the only fitting course of preparatory study.

The committee recommend that the lecturer should deliver three terminal courses, each consisting of twenty lectures, the first course between the first day of Hilary Term and the end of March; the second between the first day of Easter Term and the 10th July; and the third between the 26th October and the 24th December in every year. This division will give about two lectures to every week, of which they recommend that one should be on jurisprudence and one on the civil law, making it the text for the exposition of English law.

The committee are aware, that, to render these lectures attractive, superior qualifications will be required in the lecturer, and that his remuneration from the society should be ample; they think, however, that, as an incentive to the lecturer, part of the emolument should be dependant on the number of students; and they propose, therefore, that the annual sum of 300 guineas should be received by the lecturer from the society, and that he should also receive from every student one guinea for each terminal course of lectures.

The committee think, that, having regard to the obligation which, by the rules of the House, is now thrown on the students, of attending "readings," (which are merely nominal), and the fines imposed for non-attendance, each student might well be required to attend at least one of the terminal courses previously to being called to the Bar; but at present the committee recommend that no direction be given for enforcing attendance until some general system shall have been adopted in connexion with the other societies. With respect to the term for which the lecturer should be appointed, the committee desire that there should be a succession of able lecturers on such extensive subjects; but they are at the same time aware that the tenure of office should be sufficiently long to afford an adequate compensation for the labour of composing a well digested course; and they, therefore, think that the lecturer should be appointed for three years, to be computed from the end of six months from the date of such appointment, which preliminary period of six months is to be allowed for the composition of the lectures, and, in respect thereof, the extra sum of one hundred guineas should be given if the lecturer shall have discharged the duties of his office during the whole period for which he is to be appointed.

Thus the lecturer will receive 1000 guineas from the society, which, with the annual sums paid by the students, the benefit of publication, and, as the committee trust, the generous feeling of deserving well of the Profession, will form a sufficient inducement to men of the highest attainments to seek the office, and to be zealous in the performance of its duties.

With respect to the qualification of the lecturer, the committee recommend that he should be either a barrister or doctor of civil law. The mode of the appointment of the lecturer is a matter of some delicacy; and the committee suggest that the bench, having received the names and testimonials of the candidates, should adopt some mode of nomination which may prevent all canvassing and personal solicitation.

The committee propose that the lectures shall be opened to the students of all the societies.

The committee next request the attention of the Bench to the second part of the system of education they recommend to be adopted, and which consists in the institution of an annual examination of students proposed for the Bar, previous to their being called. The committee do not propose that such examinations shall be made compulsory, but they think it highly desirable that an opportunity of distinguishing themselves should be afforded to all young men desirous of becoming advantageously known to the Profession in a legitimate manner; and they, therefore, propose, that, on the occasion of every call to the Bar, the names of those students who have submitted themselves to examination shall be published by the society, with such honourable addition as they shall appear to have deserved; and the committee hope and believe that the attention of the Profession will be attracted to these lists, and that many young men will be found desirous of availing themselves of this unexceptionable mode of becoming known and distinguished. The committee propose that the examination shall be conducted by three benchers, assisted by the lecturer; and that it shall consist of questions in jurisprudence, common law, equity, and conveyancing, to each of which questions a numerical value shall be attached by the examining benchers.

The committee suggest that the lectures should commence in October, 1846, unless an able lecturer can be found who is prepared to enter in Easter Term next on the duties of his office; and they also propose that the first examination shall be held in Trinity Term, 1847.

The third recommendation of the committee is necessary, for the completeness of the institutions they desire to see established.

As an additional inducement to attendance at the lectures, and to exertion at the examination, the committee propose that two exhibitions of prizes of 100 guineas each should be given by the society to the two students, who, having diligently attended at least three terminal courses of lectures, shall have passed the most meritorious examination.

The committee believe that these exhibitions will not only prove to be a great incentive to attendance at the lectures and at the examination, but that they will also be found of great benefit to many young men of slender means; and the committee trust that the number of these rewards may be hereafter augmented.

THE FOLLOWING ORDERS WERE MADE AT A PARLIAMENT HOLDEN THE 16TH DAY OF JANUARY, 1846.

It is ordered, that the report of the Committee on Legal Education be approved of and confirmed.

And it is ordered, that a Lecturer be appointed, an Examination instituted, and two Exhibitions established, in the manner and subject to the regulations recommended by the said report.

And it is ordered, that it be referred back to the committee, to approve of such further regulations and details as may be requisite for the said several purposes, and to report the same to the next Parliament. And the committee are hereby empowered to take such steps as shall be necessary to render public the wish of this society to secure applications from gentlemen desirous of becoming candidates for the office of lecturer, and also to communicate with the other societies on the subject of this order.

We have received the above papers too late to be able to enter very fully at present upon the matter of their contents; but we so fully coincide with the general scheme embraced by them, that we cannot but congratulate the Profession on the prospect of improvement opened by the proceedings of the Parliament of the Middle Temple.

The plan proposed by the Benchers of that society embraces two objects, both of which have become of late years of an importance daily more visible.

One is, the imparting to students for the Bar, something like an organised preliminary professional education; the other is the creation of some legitimate and honourable means of obtaining distinction, before the face of the public and of the Profession, for those young men who have not the good fortune to carry with them to the Bar a powerful professional connexion.

The first is rendered almost indispensable, if the Bar would maintain its proper position; bearing in mind, that the education now required for the junior branch of the Profession, is so far superior to that which the attorney of even a quarter of a century ago was expected to possess, that the Young-England solicitor, if we may so designate the new generation, is no longer the man of mere quiddities and technicalities,—no longer the leguleius quidam cautor formularum,—but a well-educated gentleman, and a fair lawyer. If men at the Bar desire to be what they ought to be, still the guides and advisers of the junior branch, they must also press forward, and justify their claim to a substantial title to lead.

The second object of the Benchers of the Middle Temple is rendered most necessary by the rapid advance of that blighting system, under which the chance of success of the young lawyer depends more upon the "following" that he brings into the field, than upon his knowledge and ability.

The etiquette indispensable to the status of the Bar, (an etiquette so indispensable, that they who writhe most under its consequences, are the foremost to maintain it), requires that the Barrister should not seek business, but wait till opportunity is afforded to him. But as there are scarcely any modes open to the young counsel, by which he can make proof of his talent, until he has obtained business, it follows, that the arising of any opportunity for the diligent and able man, depends less upon the extent of his diligence and ability, than upon the extent of his connexions. And hence, while many are ruined and some even killed by the pressure of a premature business, heavier than they can bear, there are others, and in no small numbers, who are destroyed by disappointment, because, being unknown, they are powerless to evince their aptitude for business.

This mischief probably never can be wholly removed, but it will be much diminished by the proposed plan of publicly naming and giving honourable prizes to young men who shall have passed brilliant examinations before the Benchers of their Inn.

We trust that the three others Inns of Court will follow the example of the Middle Temple. But we trust at the same time, that neither the Middle Temple nor the other Inns will deem it judicious to confine the lectures so exclusively to general jurisprudence and the civil law. These are proper objects to be included in the education of Barristers; but no good reasons are given by the committee of the Middle Temple, nor do we believe that there is any good reason, why the laws of England—the very laws that counsel are to expound, and with the principles of which they ought to be peculiarly conversant—should be excluded from their course of preliminary study.

Of whom may be had, recently published,

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 61. 10s. In strong cloth bds., BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE AND PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Exeter District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of those Statutes the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superseding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fulness of the Marginal Notes.

PRINCIPLES of the LAW of REAL PROPERTY, intended as a First Book for the Use of Students in Conveyancing. By JOSHUA WILLIAMS, Esq., of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister at Law.

"Decidedly superior to any of its predecessors. . . . A Work with which no Common-law Student should neglect to provide himself at the outset of his Pupillage."—Warren's Law Studies, pp. 560, 766.

He has developed his plan with great clearness of method, in a lively and agreeable style."—Jurist.

"Is many important respects, a decided improvement upon its predecessors; and when the names of some of these are remembered, we think that, in expressing this opinion, we are passing no slight praise upon Mr. Williams's book."—Law Magazine.

"Of considerable use and merit. . . . It appears to us written in a pleasing and agreeable style, and well calculated to make a favourable impression on the Student."—Law Review.

LITTLETON'S TENURES.

In a small Pocket Volume, price 6s.,

LITTLETON'S TENURES in ENGLISH.—A new Edition, corrected, handsomely printed, in a very small Pocket Volume.

"The Student should begin by reading 'Littleton's Tenures' with extreme attention, meditating on every word, and framing every section into a diagram; abstaining altogether from the Commentary, but perusing 'Gilbert's Tenures.' After this, he should peruse 'Sir Martin Wright's Tenures' and 'Mr. Watkins's Treatise on Descents'; and then give Littleton's Tenures a second perusal. After this second perusal of the text, he should peruse it a third time, with 'the Commentary of Lord Coke,' and afterwards peruse 'Sheppard's Touchstones,' in Mr. Preston's invaluable edition of that work. The Reminiscent presumes to suggest, that the Student may then usefully peruse 'the Notes on Feuds, on Uses, and on Trusts,' in the last Edition of Coke upon Littleton, and then read Littleton and Coke, and the Notes of the last Editors."—Butler's Reminiscences, p. 61.

CRABB'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY in its PRESENT STATE.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

As, in a Treatise professing to give a connected view of a subject, arrangement is obviously an essential ingredient, this Work is on that score also (whether for the better or the worse) distinguishable from others. Except as regards the general outlines, in which the plan of Sir Matthew Hale (afterwards adopted by Sir William Blackstone) has been partially followed, the endeavour has been to make all the matter follow in such order as shall serve to give a clear and distinct view of the several points, and their consequent bearings on the subject in question.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 7, 1846.

OUR readers will have noticed, in THE JURIST of last week, the important case of Young v. Smith, (ante, p. 52), deciding that the prohibition contained in the 26th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, (The Joint-stock Companies Act), does not apply to companies for executing public works which cannot be carried into execution without obtaining the authority of Parliament, and, consequently, that the sale of railway scrip, after provisional, but before complete, registration of the railway company, is not made illegal by the statute. Our readers will probably recollect that this is the construction of the statute which was contended for in this Work, (9 Jurist, 418); and it is with satisfaction that we perceive, that, to a considerable extent, the arguments to which recourse was had in the paper referred to coincide with those that occurred to the court in Young v. Smith. It is not our present purpose to re-argue any of the points involved in the construction of this statute with reference to the sale of railway scrip, though we may, perhaps, in a future Number resume the subject, particularly as it is understood that the decision in Young v. Smith will not be acquiesced in. We shall at present content ourselves with a few observations, suggested by what fell from the court in Young v. Smith, directly or impliedly, upon the general character of our modern acts of Parliament. There is one observation in particular made by one of the learned judges, the perfect correctness of which we believe none, not even those who, it is said, intend to carry the case of Young v. Smith further, will be found to dispute; and that is, the observation which fell from Mr. Baron Alderson with regard to that curse of modern acts of Parliament, the interpretation clause. "If," said his Lordship, "it were not the practice to insert interpretation clauses, the framers of statutes would be obliged to express their meaning in intelligible words." As it is, the interpretation clause is to the modern legislator, what the margin for contingencies is to the modern railway engineer. Whenever it is very difficult, or even a little troublesome, to state a clause of an act of Parliament with accuracy, the difficulty is not manfully grappled with, but thrown forward or backward, as the case may be, to the interpretation clause. To that clause we are to look to see whether the Legislature, in speaking of one, intends many, or, speaking of land, means some interest in land which is not land, or, speaking of any company, means anything but any company, and means, on the contrary, to exclude from the definition or description a great many companies. In truth, an interpretation clause is, in nine cases out of ten, not in any sense a clause interpreting the act,—but no more than a declaration to the effect, that, whereas the act is so worded, to avoid the trouble of wording it better, that in a great many supposable cases it would, if construed according to its actual words, be quite nonsense, the courts shall not be bound to read the words as they are written, but shall make sense of them, if they can. It is bad enough for the public to suffer from the unavoidable doubts that must arise upon the law, where the law is the result of, or rather is expressed by, a series of decisions upon the application of one or more principles, the reason for which is either lost in the obscurity of antiquity, or is only to be found in rules of property, originally framed when property was held under tenures, and was subservient, in the general opinion of mankind, to purposes of public policy, very different from those which prevail at this day. It is, we say, bad enough for the public, under such circumstances, to suffer from doubts and difficulties, which no intellects, bound by existing law, can entirely solve or remove; but it is beyond all endurance, that, when the Legislature is dealing with purely modern subjects,—with purely modern ideas and rules,—when it has, in truth, no difficulty before it, but that of saying what specific new regulations shall affect rights of property so modern, that their very birth is remembered even by young men, and of defining or describing what particular classes of such new interests they intend to deal with; it is, we say, beyond all endurance, when such only are the difficulties with which the Legislature has to deal,—difficulties which, to be overcome, do not require the destruction of any rules of property, nor the reconciling of any opposite reasonings, but merely the expression in the English tongue of the meaning of the framers of a statute,—that acts should issue from the great officina legum, on which even eminent judges are obliged first to doubt, and only to be convinced by the arguments of counsel, (see Mr. B. Platt's observations in Young v. Smith), or with which they feel themselves obliged to deal so tenderly, as almost to excuse themselves for venturing to put a definite construction upon them.

Observe the almost timid tone of the eminent Chief Judge of the court that decided Young v. Smith, and the sort of solicitude with which he seems to seek for some half-constitutional maxim that will justify him in understanding the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110. "I think," said his Lordship, speaking of the 2nd and 26th sections of the act, "that, if the meaning of the Legislature were doubtful, we could not, comparing these two sections together, and pronouncing judgment as to the legal effect of the language used in them, hold, that parties making such a contract as that now before us were liable to the penalties inflicted by the 26th section. But it is very satisfactory, I think, to be able to discover in this act of Parliament, other sections which shew that this is the meaning which, probably, was intended by the Legislature; because, I must say, that I think we are bound, as much as we can, to give effect to what is discovered to be the intention of the Legislature; and, instead of giving effect to doubts where the language may be obscure, or not perfectly plain, I think we are bound, wherever we see the meaning and intention of the Legislature, to put such a construction on the language used as may give effect to the intention, if that intention be sufficiently plain."

The maxim that his Lordship lays down, touching the spirit in which statutes should be looked at, is, if we may venture to offer our humble tribute to its merit, as sound in policy as it is true in law. But the very necessity of giving it utterance, in reference to a most modern statute on a most modern subject-matter, and that in a form which seems to shew, that, unless the court threw round it the protection of such a maxim, the unfortunate statute would be unmanageable, is a necessity that ought not to exist, and of which the commercial and legal public have deep reason to complain.

CRABB'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 2l. 18s. boards,

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY in ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABB, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

As, in a Treatise professing to give a connected view of a subject, arrangement is obviously an essential ingredient, this Work is on that score also (whether for the better or the worse) distinguishable from others. Except as regards the general outlines, in which the plan of Sir Matthew Hale (afterwards adopted by Sir William Blackstone) has been partially followed, the endeavour has been to make all the matter follow in such order as shall serve to give a clear and distinct view of the several points, and their consequent bearings on the subject in question.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

Also,

LONDON, FEBRUARY 14, 1846.

A question of some difficulty, upon the construction of the Stamp Act, (55 Geo. 3. c. 184, sched., pt. 1), arises occasionally in practice, in reference to the measure of the ad-valorem stamp, upon a purchase of an equity of redemption.

Most of our readers are, of course, well aware, that, according to the usual form of conveyance to pass an equity of redemption, the vendor conveys the land to the purchaser or his trustee, (subject to the mortgage debt, if the purchaser is not himself the mortgagee); and the purchaser, if he is not the mortgagee, covenants with the vendor to pay the debt; or, if he is the mortgagee, releases the debt. This is the usual transaction whenever the equity of redemption is really worth something; or, whenever the equity of redemption being worth nothing, the mortgagee himself takes a conveyance of it in consideration of the debt and interest, the mortgagee being a person to whom it is practically material to be freed from the debt, if he relinquishes the ownership of the security. Whenever this is the transaction, it is perfectly clear, that the ad-valorem stamp must cover the amount of the mortgage-money, as well as the consideration, if any, given for the equity of redemption.

But, occasionally, instances occur, in which the debt, by accumulation of arrears of interest, so enormously exceeds the value of the security, and in which the mortgagor is so hopelessly insolvent, that the equity of redemption is superfluous as a protection against the right of redemption of the mortgagor, and the release of the debt is perfectly devoid of any practical utility to the mortgagor, whose safety against being sued upon the bond or covenant is, that he is, and is well known to be, incapable of paying the debt. In this sort of case, the only value of the equity of redemption is by way of giving completeness to the title; and the only object, as between the parties, is for the mortgagor to obtain some slight amount of valuable consideration for his equity of redemption, and for the mortgagee to get a conveyance at the least possible expense. The question then arises, whether, if the mortgage debt be technically kept on foot as the debt of the mortgagor, the ad-valorem stamp must cover the mortgage debt; or whether it is not sufficient if it covers merely the consideration paid for the equity of redemption.

The solution of this question depends principally upon the construction of a clause in the schedule to the Stamp Act, which is in the following words:—"And where any land or property shall be sold and conveyed, in consideration, wholly or in part, of any sum of money charged thereon by way of mortgage, wadset, or otherwise, and then due and owing to the purchaser, or shall be sold and conveyed subject to any mortgage, wadset, bond, or other debt, or to any gross or entire sum of money to be afterwards paid by the purchaser, such sum of money or debt shall be deemed the purchase or consideration money, or part of the purchase or consideration money, as the case may be, in respect whereof the said ad-valorem duty is to be paid."

The two questions upon this clause are, firstly, whether, supposing a mortgagee to purchase an equity of redemption for any given sum, and to take a conveyance without releasing the debt, the transaction comes within the first branch of the clause; and, secondly, whether, if the purchase be by a stranger, who takes a conveyance of the equity of redemption, without covenanting to pay the mortgage debt, the transaction comes within the second branch of the clause.

Technically speaking, we apprehend, that, in the case first supposed, the purchase is not in consideration of a debt then due and owing to the purchaser; for the debt, not being released, remains the debt of the mortgagor, who might, we apprehend, be sued for it.

It seems settled, that a mortgagee may, after foreclosure, bring an action upon the bond or covenant contained in the mortgage-deed, for the debt; only he thereby opens the foreclosure. (Aylett v. Hill, 2 Dick. 551; Dashwood v. Blythway, 1 Eq. Ca. Abr. 387; Perry v. Barker, 13 Ves. 198). That is, provided he will consent to revive the mortgagor's right to redeem, he may sue for the debt, although he has taken the estate by a decree of foreclosure.

We are not apprised of any decision, that a mortgagee, having purchased the equity of redemption, may sue upon the debt, if it has not been released; but we submit to our readers, that there seems no reason why the doctrine applicable to the cases where he has obtained the equity of redemption by foreclosure, would not be equally applicable to the case where he has obtained it by purchase and conveyance. The doctrine of estoppel is out of the question, as the conveyance of the estate has nothing to do with the covenant to pay the debt; the question, whether the estate is or is not a security for the debt, being, in fact, a question purely of equity. And when we find the debt left, in point of form and at law, subsisting, upon a conveyance of the equity of redemption, the inference to be collected from the deed itself, so far from shewing any intention of the parties to treat the debt as the consideration, shews, on the contrary, an intention not to relinquish the debt as a subsisting claim; but, to reserve to the purchaser his character of mortgagee, and his right, as such, still to proceed for the debt, if at any time he shall prefer doing so, subject to the condition of waiving his right to the equity of redemption of the estate. It may be very true, that, in substance, the debt is the consideration for the estate, thus far; that, so long as the debt remains unpaid, the estate remains the creditor's; and that the creditor cannot have the estate absolutely without giving up the debt; but that is only, in other words, to say that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee is not absolutely destroyed; and the question ultimately comes back to this, whether a creditor, purchasing an estate of his debtor, not by absolutely giving up his claim, but by keeping, as it were, his right to sue only in abeyance, and reserving a right to sue if and when he chooses to give up the absolute ownership of the estate, can be said, strictly, to have given his debt as the consideration of the estate. If the debt cannot be said, in the strictest and fullest sense, to be the consideration, we apprehend the Stamp Act does not apply, as we must recollect that it is in the nature of a penal act, and is always construed most strictly, sometimes, indeed, with absurd strictness, against the revenue.

The case of a purchaser of an equity of redemption, when the mortgage debt is in a third person, the purchaser not covenanting with the mortgagor to pay the debt, must be dealt with in reference to the second branch of the clause of the Stamp Act above referred to; and the question will be, whether, in such a case, the consideration is a mortgage debt, to be afterwards paid by the purchaser. Now, we contend, in the first place, that the statute, by these last words, must be intended to mean not a debt which the purchaser may, in events, have to pay, but a debt which he is immediately liable to pay and to be sued for. That the mortgagee cannot sue the purchaser for the debt, is clear.

He may take the estate, but there is no personal property between him and the purchaser of the equity of redemption. But, supposing the mortgagee to sue and recover against the mortgagor, leaving the estate untouched, it is equally clear, that, at law, the mortgagor has no remedy against the purchaser, who has not covenanted with him to pay the debt, and has, on the contrary, expressly bought the estate subject to the debt, that is, subject to the right of the mortgagee to pay himself out of it, if he prefers the security of the estate to the personal liability of the mortgagor. It is true, that, in that case, equity will hold the purchaser liable to indemnify the mortgagor; for, as Lord Eldon expressed it in Waring v. Ward, (7 Ves. 337), "This court would, if he (the purchaser) receives possession, and has the profits, independent of contract, raise upon his conscience an obligation to indemnify the vendor against the personal obligation to pay the money due upon the vendor's transaction of mortgage; for, being become the owner of the estate, he must be supposed to intend to indemnify the vendor against the mortgage." But what is this liability of the purchaser? It is not an immediate liability, either at law or in equity, to pay the debt; not a liability which makes the debt a debt in all events, afterwards to be paid by the purchaser, but merely an equitable liability,—a species of implied contract in equity,—that, if the mortgagee is made to pay out of his personal estate, the purchaser of his security shall then, and only on that contingency, be bound, not to pay the debt, but to compensate the mortgagor for having paid the debt. We submit that such a liability does not make the mortgage debt a debt to be afterwards paid by the purchaser, and, therefore, that it does not form the consideration for the purchase of the estate, within the meaning of the Stamp Act.

CRABB'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 2l. 18s. boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABB, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

Several Assurance Offices belong exclusively to Lawyers, and the advantages of their connexion are acknowledged, but those advantages have hitherto been confined to the Shareholders.

It is one of the objects of this Institution to place the Benefits arising from this connexion within the reach of every Member of the Profession in the United Kingdom, whether he be a Shareholder or not.

Another and paramount object is to give the Assured perfect security at the most moderate cost, and to afford them the Advantages, without the risks, of Mutual Assurance.

The Public will have the option of assuring either upon a scale entitling them to participate in the Profits, or upon a lower scale, without profits.

Four-fifths of the Profits from Assurances upon the higher scale will be divided periodically among the Assured; and one-fifth will be carried to a Fund, comprising all the profits accruing to the Society from other sources.

The first charge upon this Fund will be the payment of Interest, at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum to the Shareholders, upon the amount of the Capital paid up; then a portion of the surplus (not exceeding one-tenth) will be applied in aid of a Widows' and Orphans' Fund, or Nominee Society, for the benefit of the Widows and Families of Members of the Profession; and of the residue one moiety will be divided amongst the Shareholders, and the other moiety between the Solicitors through whose means Assurances are effected.

The attention of the Profession is earnestly invited to the principles of this Society, which combine perfect security to the Assured, with advantages to the Profession superior to those afforded by the existing Law Assurance Offices.

The Society will transact every species of business usually undertaken by Life Assurance Companies; and the utmost care will be taken to render the arrangement of this Office satisfactory to the Profession and the Public.

A Table of Premiums is in course of preparation, and will shortly be published.

Some Shares remain to be allotted, for which application, in the usual form, may be made to the Secretary.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 21, 1846.

THE criminal law of this country is so much the subject of legislative enactment, is so fenced about with positive rules and statutes, and has in it comparatively so little of what we are accustomed to call judge-made-law, that the following statement respecting the criminal law of our neighbours north of the Tweed presents to our minds a striking contrast. In an able article in the Edinburgh Review on Scottish Criminal Jurisprudence and Procedure, the writer remarks, "Suppose a person were to ask this question, 'What part of Europe is it where a court of law claims, and, in virtue of its own decision, actually exercises the power of declaring any action that it thinks proper to be a crime; and of applying whatever punishment it deems expedient to the new offences thus judicially introduced?' Would he not be considered a conceited fellow, who was stating a conundrum, to which he knew that, in the plain meaning of the words, there was no answer? But, unfortunately, there is an answer. The place is Scotland; and the court is the supreme criminal court of this wise old country." The court of judiciary in Scotland exercises the function of introducing, for the first time, totally new offences; that is, of declaring acts never existing, or never objected to before, as criminal, to be new crimes. And the court claims this power not in virtue of any statute, but solely under what has been termed "its own inherent authority." In evidence of this the reviewer quotes the following passage from Hume's Commentaries on the Law of Scotland respecting Crimes:—"Another point, in which the custom of the two countries remarkably differs, is, with respect to the punishment of new crimes, or modes of transgression. It seems to be held in England, that no court has power to take cognisance of any new offence, although highly pernicious, and approaching very nearly to others which have been prohibited, until some statute has declared it to be a crime, and assigned a punishment. With us the maxim is directly the reverse; our supreme court have an inherent power as such competently to punish every act which is obviously of a criminal nature, though it be such which, in time past, has never been the subject of prosecution." (Introd.) "This," observes the reviewer, "he gives as the general principle; and then, in the body of his work, he illustrates it by examples. Speaking of the competency of transporting for sedition, he says, 'Even where a crime is entirely new, and has never been the subject of trial, still our judges have the undoubted power, and are in the use, of applying such a remedy to it, not excepting transportation, as the nature and degree of the evil seem to require.' (Vol. 1, p. 358, edit: 1819). Again, speaking of the English statutes against threatening letters, he observes, 'The truth is, that we have little reason to regret the want of these statutes, because our common law has native vigour to punish these enormities in a manner which the common law of England would not have authorised, and which is fully equal to what the urgency of the evil, in this country, has at any time required.' (Vol. 1, p. 436). Lastly, after mentioning that mere combination by workmen to raise wages was declared a crime by the court, for the first time, in 1813, he says, 'This new point of dittay seems, therefore, now to be thoroughly established, and it furnishes another illustration of the character of our common law, and of its power to chastise, of its own native vigour, all wrongs and disorders, as the state of society brings them forth, which are found to be materially dangerous to the public welfare.' (Vol. 1, p. 491)."

"These passages," the reviewer continues, "leave no doubt as to the learned author's exact meaning. Every wrong or disorder materially dangerous may be punished as society brings them forth, without judicial process."

dent or statutory authority, merely by the 'native vigour' of our common law. But Mr. Bell* explains, with perfect accuracy, that this doctrine is plainly not meant to be applied solely to the case of 'offences which, although not yet distinguished by any short and unbending nomina juris, do yet fall under some defined category of crime (and) are comprehended under some clearly marked principle or rule, which has in former times been enforced !' (Sup., p. 174). If this had been all, it would only have amounted to the humble doctrine, that a culprit cannot escape by committing an old crime in an original way. But Mr. Bell says, justly, that the principle laid down by Hume applies, 'not merely to such cases as these, where a new form of transgression against an old, established, and clearly marked rule of law has been invented, but where an entirely new, and by the law unheard-of, description of wickedness has sprung up, and been displayed in acts which it is impossible to regard as partaking of the same individual species of criminality with any offence that has been punished before.' (P. 174)." And the power of applying adequate punishment is involved in that of declaring new crimes. Hume lays it down expressly, that the court, on rearing up a new offence, can always "chastise it with a suitable and reasonable censure," but only "with the exception of life or limb." This limitation, however, has been dissented from; and the court is reported to have been, in 1808, in a case for child-stealing, unanimous in holding "that they had powers, from the inherent nature of their jurisdiction, to pronounce a capital sentence on a crime meriting that severity†." The fact, indeed, is clearly established, however strange it may seem to us, that in Scotland "a power of judicially introducing new crimes, and of applying adequate punishments, does exist; or, which is the same thing in as far as the people are concerned, has been decided to exist; and that this authority adheres to the court by the mere force of the common law."

Well may the writer in the Edinburgh Review exclaim, that the policy of such a law is a question in which every one of the lieges—man, woman, and child—has the deepest personal interest. The only defences that can be made for it are utterly frivolous. Nor does it even appear to have the authority of antiquity. On the contrary, there are many reasons for doubting whether it was anciently understood that any such principle had got itself embedded in the law. "One of these reasons," says the reviewer, "is, that the whole Scotch statute-book teems with new-made crimes. We have been told that there are greatly above 300 of of them. And the actions thus condemned by Parliament are precisely the same with those which are described, and, indeed, expressly specified, by Baron Hume, as within the creative jurisdiction of the court,—practices deemed commercially or politically dangerous, breaches of good order, and injuries inflicted by gross violations of moral duty. There was no need of one-tenth, if of any, of these parliamentary interferences, if there had been understood to be a judicial board always sitting, by which 'all wrongs and disor- ders, as the state of society brings them forth,' could be repressed."

According to the writer we have quoted, the principle is not laid down as law, or even announced for consideration in any legal work prior to that of Baron Hume; and the first time that it was mentioned in any printed book was in the reports of the Sedition Trials in 1793 and 1794. Baron Hume's work was under composition while these trials were proceeding, and was published about three years afterwards. Being engrafted into the Commentaries, it does not appear to have been acted upon again till the year 1808, when it reappeared on certain trials for combination. The account of these is too long to be inserted here; it is sufficient to say that three of the judges thought combination, however alarming, not indictable, and other three thought the reverse; and the result was, that, in 1808, combination, even when connected with violence, was not a crime. "But, in 1811, by which time one of the judges who had been against the relevancy (against treating combination as a crime) had died, a similar charge was preferred against some shoemakers. The objection was renewed, and again argued, and it was announced that the court now thought that combination was a crime. However, no trial took place, because there were some technical obstacles." "A further experiment was made by indicting some cotton weavers in 1813, who were found guilty of mere combinations and punished with various terms of imprisonment for what, five years before, had been judicially declared not to be a crime." In 1818, a mere threat to strike was found a relevant charge against two colliers. "Thus," says the writer, "in the course of about nine years and a half, did the law vibrate between combination effected by striking work and violence being no crime at all, and its being a crime, when effected by simple union, without even striking."

In six or seven years after, Parliament, reasoning on the very same principles as the court had done, decided that combination was not only not dangerous, but that, in itself, and apart from violence, it was beneficial.

We have said enough now to make our readers acquainted with what seemed to us, and must seem to them, an extraordinary state of criminal law in Scotland. Its existence seems hitherto not to have been generally known to the public, and probably it has but to be known to be terminated. With us in England it is more a matter of curiosity and surprise than apprehension, though attachment to our own institutions must teach us to wish, that, even amongst our neighbours, such a judicial power should not be permitted to exist.

The abuse of the Bar seems a never-failing resource for the amusement of those whose speculations lead them most to require its assistance. Every mischief which results from the folly of litigants, or their inordinate desire of gain, every cause of defeat to which they expose themselves while grasping at the means of overcoming an opponent, is laid to the charge of the Bar.

The last grievance is that of the shareholders in railroad companies, who invoke the aid of Parliament to prevent counsel practising in committees from accepting retainers for more than one committee per day; because, it is said, counsel accepting retainers for several committees, cannot attend to all, and, therefore, they pocket by a flagrant "robbery"—yes, robbery is the mild and urbane term—the fees given by those whose committees they cannot attend. How often and how long, O obtuse litigants and shareholders! must it be repeated to you, that, if this be a grievance, it is one of your own creation, and one which yourselves, and yourselves only, can destroy? If you will persist in persecuting Mr. A. or Mr. B. with briefs, when you know that they have already more than human strength and human time can get through,—if you will believe that only Mr. A. or Mr. B. can adequately represent your interests, why do you repine because these gentlemen yield to your importunities, and give you that which, when you retained them, you knew was all they could give, the chance of their services? If men will buy contingent interests, have they any right to complain, because the contingencies on which they are to become entitled, do not happen? You invoke the aid of Parliament, to do—what? To say to counsel "You shall not accept retainers;" and to say to shareholders and their agents, "You shall not buy the chance of particular counsel's advocacy!" Would it not be as well, at once, to ask of Parliament to compel counsel to attend and practise at its bar for a daily fee to be fixed by Parliament; and would it not be as well, at the same time, to ask Parliament to make every counsel equally popular? Surely, of all the absurdities that of late have disgraced the attacks made upon the Bar, the greatest is that which lays to their charge the consequence of the star worship of suitors, and the weakness with which their folly is petted and pampered by their agents.

* A Supplement to Hume's Commentaries on the Law of Scotland respecting Crimes. By Benjamin Robert Bell, Esq., Advocate. Edinburgh, 1844.

Far be it from us to attempt to deny the hard-earned reputation and popularity of a Follett, a Kelly, an Austin,—a reputation and popularity which are too often earned with the life-blood of their gifted and doomed possessors. We ought not, perhaps, to wonder that clients should strive against each other for the advantage of having their interests advocated by men, whose skill and talent seem ever ready to take advantage of every success, and to beat down every obstacle; but we may and do wonder that they who are crowding into the chambers of the popular advocate; they who are clamorous in his antechamber for the chance of his assistance; they who pour out their treasures into his coffers and their choice offerings at his feet, knowing that, to use their own words, he cannot be ubiquitous;—we do wonder, we say, when we see these very persons malign the Bar with the coarsest vituperatives,—not for the fault of the general Bar, not for the fault of the few idolised leaders,—but for the fault of their own utter folly, which will buy a mere chance, and yet complain that it is but a chance!

Listen, O litigants and shareholders! If you are dissatisfied with the eminent leaders of the parliamentary Bar for accepting many retainers; go to them, or rather to their clerks, and ask of any of them, if he will take a brief for one committee, and undertake to attend exclusively that committee, and you will receive a most emphatic negative. Go, then, a step lower in the scale of popularity, and tender your brief on the same conditions to a popular junior, and there you will receive the emphatic negative. Go down now still somewhat, till you reach the perhaps talented, and certainly industrious and ambitious, but still unknown, junior, and tender to him your brief upon the terms of his being at his post in your committee while it sits, and probably then your brief will be accepted. But this does not suit your purpose. You do not want to have the services of the accessible, but of the inaccessible man. You make a man a king, and then wonder that he rules.

As to Parliament interfering in the matter, the very notion is absurd. Parliament will not so stultify itself. As the retainers of counsel and fees to counsel are merely gratuitous, it would be impossible for Parliament to attempt to regulate the relation of agent and counsel. It is inconceivable how any standing orders could touch the right of a suitor to make a present to counsel, (and that is what, in truth, the retaining fee is), trusting to his honour to attend a committee in return, if not elsewhere engaged. The only way in which the evil can be cured (assuming it to be one) is, by the suitors adopting the plan of procuring the certain services of a man of second or third-rate popularity, from whom it is practicable to obtain a promise of attention to the case entrusted to him to the exclusion of any others till the first is concluded, rather than to the chance of the advocacy of the one or two universal favourites, who cannot be expected to give, and would be idiots if they did give, any pledge. It is plain, that, if there are ten committees sitting at once upon the bills of ten companies, and the ten companies are all determined to have one man as counsel, some of the ten must be disappointed. And it is equally clear that the fault is not in the one man whom they all insist upon taking the chance of having, but of those of the companies who insist upon hoping against hope, and retaining him after he is already retained to the very last fraction of his time.

One word before we conclude these observations, upon the alleged exorbitancy of the fees given to parliamentary counsel. It is quite true that the learning necessary for advocacy before railway committees is not so difficult and tedious of acquisition, as the learning requisite for the equity or common lawyer. And it may, at first sight, therefore, seem strange that parliamentary fees should be, as they are, at least three times as large as the fees given upon equity or common-law business. But it is not to be forgotten, that, in the first place, the business of the parliamentary counsel is over in less than half a year, and during the remainder of the year he may go, if he likes, to Persia, or anywhere else; in the second place, while it does last, it is harassing and fatiguing to the most intense degree; and, in the third place, and this, though last, is not least to the brighter spirits, it must be remembered, that the only reward of the successful parliamentary counsel is the acquisition of fortune; that for him the highest honours of the Profession have, in general, no existence; that for him the hope of posthumous fame is scarcely to be entertained; that for him political life is closed so long as he is compelled to labour in his Profession; that, in fine, he has no reward to look forward to but money. His efforts are never associated with any great constitutional question; he cannot identify himself with the improvement of the laws of his country; his struggles are concerning the conflict of gradients and traffic tables; his noblest object is to impress on Parliament the merits of an iron road; and, were it not for the occasional gleam of sunshine thrown across the desert of his labours by the light of science, there would be little in the occupation of the parliamentary counsel to make business anything beyond the tamest and most wearying drudgery. Nothing, therefore, but high fees will tempt men of any energy of character or intellectual ability, to abandon the ordinary practice of the law, for that of the parliamentary committees; and, keeping in view all these circumstances, we say most unhesitatingly, that the fees given to parliamentary counsel, however high they may sound, and however much they may enrich a few very successful advocates, are not in the least degree higher than is necessary to secure ability for the parliamentary Bar.

THE TRANSFER OF RAILWAY SCRIP.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE JURIST.

SIR,—The case of Young v. Smith, in the Exchequer, (10 Jur. 52), has decided that the transfer of railway scrip, after provisional registration merely, and before complete registration of the company, is legal; and that sect. 26 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, does not apply to railway companies. If I remember aright, your pages were the first to question the opinion of the Attorney-General, which had been given to the effect, that such transfer was illegal; and arguments pro and con have since appeared in your columns.

The decision in Young v. Smith, under the circumstances attending it, is not considered, among professional men, quite satisfactory, and it is to be hoped that the judgment of the Exchequer will be reviewed by a court of error. The judgment was delivered in the absence of two learned judges of the court, Barons Parke and Rolfe; it was given off-hand, and without the usual signification, in important cases, of "Curia advisari vult." Moreover, the 7th section of the Joint-stock Companies Act does not appear to have been sufficiently brought before the court. By that section, companies, expressly including railway companies, are prohibited "from acting otherwise than provisionally in accordance with the act," until completely registered. Then comes the question, "What is acting otherwise than provisionally in accordance with the act?" Sect. 26 appears to point out one mode of such acting, as it declares that no subscriber of any joint-stock company shall dispose of his share before such company is completely registered. It has been ingeniously argued in your pages, that sect. 7 applies to the acts of companies as companies, while sect. 26 applies merely to the acts of individual subscribers. However this may be, it would have been more satisfactory had this point been brought specifically to the notice of the court.

As to the intention of the statute, a search into Hansard will shew that one of the chief objects of its enactment was the prevention of excessive gambling in railway scrip, and it was so declared at the time by Mr. Gladstone.

But, if the decision in Young v. Smith holds good, it by no means follows that we should admit the extensive corollary which is sought to be derived from it. It is said by some, that, if the sale of scrip be legal, then the case of Kempson v. Saunders (4 Bing. 5) applies, and invests such sale with certain incidents, that, if the undertaking be abandoned, the purchaser may recover the money he paid to the scrip-vendor, the vendor from the preceding vendor, and so on until they arrive at the projectors, "which," said Best, C. J., in that case, "will be doing a great service."

In Kempson v. Saunders the defendant had sold to the plaintiff, at 3*l.* 5*s.* premium, twenty shares in a projected railway company, on each of which shares a deposit of 2*l.* had been paid by the original holder, of whom they had been purchased by the defendant. The committee, who had framed the project and issued the scrip, agreed that nothing should be done till the sanction of the Legislature was procured; they afterwards abandoned the project, and no act of Parliament was ever obtained. The scheme having failed, the plaintiff brought his action for money had and received, on the ground of failure of consideration, and had a verdict. It was said by Best, C. J., "There was nothing illegal in the transaction in which the plaintiff was concerned, because, at the meeting convened for the purpose of framing the project, it was agreed that nothing should be done till the sanction of the Legislature had been obtained. While things were in this state, the defendant, who was not an original subscriber, but had purchased these shares, (which, in fact, were not saleable till the company was formed), sold them to the plaintiff; but he sold a nothing, an alleged title of no value." In the first place, it is to be observed, the company, in Kempson v. Saunders, could hardly be said to exist as a company until it received an act of Parliament; it was, at the utmost, a mere scheme, in which nothing was to be done until the act was obtained.

But it is not so in railway companies provisionally registered. They have certain powers; they are quasi companies, and in some respects may act as such; they may assume the name of the intended company, open subscription lists, allot shares, and receive deposits. It cannot be said, in such case, nothing is to be done until the act of Parliament is obtained. Neither can it be said the scrip are not saleable until then, for we know in practice they are (or rather were before the panic) sold every day; such sale was held to be not contrary to 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, in Young v. Smith, and the modern doctrine seems to favour the transferability of scrip. It also appears to me, Sir, with the utmost deference for the learned Chief Justice Best, that reasonable doubts may be entertained whether the doctrine laid down in Kempson v. Saunders would now be held good law. The judgment therein proceeded on the ground of failure of consideration, the scrip being, it was said, of no value. Now, the principle on which consideration fails seems to be this: there is an implied promise of something existing which does not exist, or of something being performed in future which is not performed, and, in consideration of which implied promise, money has been paid. A familiar instance is, where a purchaser of an estate has paid a deposit, and vendor fails in making out a title. It is thus imported into the original contract, and is in the nature of a condition precedent to the recipient's right absolutely to retain the money.

It is well known there must be a total failure of consideration, and the parties must be capable of being placed in statu quo; but is there any implied warranty or promise on the part of the seller of scrip, that the undertaking shall not be abandoned by the company? Is he to take upon himself the burden of answering for payment of deposits, punctuality and veracity of engineers and surveyors, the decision of railway committees, and like uncertainties over which he has no control whatever? It seems rather to be a sale of title to shares, which may be worth much or little, something or nothing, and the maxim, "caveat emptor," should apply. Scrip are supposed to be of a certain value when they are sold, that is, they represent the sum which may be obtained for them in the share market. But their present value is fluctuating, their future value wholly unascertained and inappreciable, and the purchaser takes them knowing these facts. He has all he bargains for,—the scrip, a mere title to shares, with all its defects and advantages. There is no fraud on the part of the vendor; no consideration, it seems to me, is kept back, to which failure can be said to attach.

Take the case of a transfer of a lottery ticket, when lotteries were legal; in the event of its turning out a blank, it would not be contended that the transferee could recover the amount he had paid for it.

Again, it is well known that many of the paintings of Sir Joshua Reynolds have unfortunately lost their colours within the last few years. Had one of these, in the full bloom of healthy colour, been sold to a connoisseur, and had he, to his dismay, perceived it one morning undergoing the dissolving process, and fading into a dead white, it would scarcely be just that he should make the vendor pay for the faulty use or mixture of colours by the artist.

And yet one would think there is no more warranty in the sale of scrip, than in that of lottery tickets or pictures.

Perhaps, Sir, at the present time, the above remarks, on a subject of such general interest, may be acceptable to your readers.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

Temple, Feb. 18, 1846.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Feb. 14.—Lord Denman, C. J., delivered the judgment of the court in the following cases:—

De Medina v. Grove (case)—Rule absolute for arresting judgment.

Same v. Same (assumpsit)—Rule absolute for nonsuit.

Rogers v. Brenton—Rule absolute for new trial*.

Milner v. Myers, and five other actions by the same plaintiff—Judgment for defendant.

Lord Denman, C. J., said, "We think it is desirable to reform the practice as to motions in arrest of judgment. Where the question is merely on the form of declaration, and the rule obtained is, therefore, simply in arrest of judgment, we shall direct the case to be put down in the Special Paper, instead of the New Trial Paper."

Prospectus.

Several Assurance Offices belong exclusively to Lawyers, and the advantages of their connexion are acknowledged, but those advantages have hitherto been confined to the Shareholders.

It is one of the objects of this Institution to place the Benefits arising from this connexion within the reach of every Member of the Profession in the United Kingdom, whether he be a Shareholder or not.

Another and paramount object is to give the Assured perfect security at the most moderate cost, and to afford them the Advantages, without the risks, of Mutual Assurance.

The Public will have the option of assuring either upon a scale entitling them to participate in the Profits, or upon a lower scale, without profits.

Four Fifths of the Profits from Assurances upon the higher scale will be divided periodically among the Assured; and one Fifth will be carried to a Fund, comprising all the profits accruing to the Society from other sources.

The first charge upon this Fund will be the payment of Interest, at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum to the Shareholders, upon the amount of the Capital paid up; then a portion of the surplus (not exceeding one tenth) will be applied in aid of a Widows' and Orphans' Fund, or Nominee Society, for the benefit of the Widows and Families of Members of the Profession; and of the residue one moiety will be divided amongst the Shareholders, and the other moiety between the Solicitors through whose means Assurances are effected.

The attention of the Profession is earnestly invited to the principles of this Society, which combine perfect security to the Assured, with advantages to the Profession superior to those afforded by the existing Law Assurance Offices.

The Society will transact every species of business usually undertaken by Life Assurance Companies; and the utmost care will be taken to render the arrangement of this Office satisfactory to the Profession and the Public.

A Table of Premiums is in course of preparation, and will shortly be published.

Some Shares remain to be allotted, for which application, in the usual form, may be made to the Secretary.

CRABB'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 21. 18s. boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABB, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars. In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

This Society is on the principle of Mutual Assurance, and its object is to afford to all Classes the utmost advantage that can be derived from Life Assurance.

For the purpose, however, of affording the Members of this Society, during its infancy, the most effectual Security, its Engagements will be guaranteed by a subscribed Capital, on which 5*l.* per cent. Interest will be paid out of the Funds of the Society half-yearly, and the Capital, with a Bonus of 50*l.* per cent., will be paid off as soon as sufficient Profit shall have been realised.

It is proposed to appoint County or Local Directors chiefly of the Medical and Legal Professions, in the principal Towns of the Kingdom. This will materially promote an object which the Directors propose to carry into effect as soon as practicable—viz. the Formation of Local Boards.

AT THE END OF DECEMBER, 1851, and thenceforward annually, the affairs of this Society will be investigated, and, after reserving a sum sufficient to meet all Liabilities, one-fifth of the surplus Profits will be allotted as follows:—two-thirds to the Members' Fund for the assured for Life, and one-third to the Shareholders' Fund for repaying the subscribed Capital and Bonus. The remaining four-fifths of the whole surplus Profits to be reserved to enter into the average of succeeding Years, and, after the Liquidation of the subscribed Capital, the whole of the one-fifth of the net Profits will be annually divisible amongst the assured for life, and the remaining four-fifths reserved for the average, as before. The Rates of Premiums have been constructed by W. S. B. Woolhouse, Esq., F.R.A.S.

COMFORT in SHAVING depends on the proper use of a good Razor, an efficient Strop, and a paste to renovate the surface of the strop when it becomes black and choked with the steel from the Razor; to these must be added a Soap that will not dry suddenly on the face, and a smooth taper-pointed elastic Shaving-brush; unless all these points are attended to, and the razor wiped and stropped after shaving, that operation must always be a troublesome even if not a painful one. Those gentlemen whose Shaving Apparatus is defective are invited to J. MECH'S Establishment, 4, Leadenhall-street, London, where they will not only obtain all they require for the toilet, reasonable and efficient, but may also procure, gratis, his instructions for easy shaving, stropping, &c. A large assortment of Papier Maché Manufactures, Dressing-cases, Work-boxes, and Writing-desks, Bagatelle-tables, &c.

LONDON, FEBRUARY 28, 1846.

Rumours are current that changes of immense extent and importance are contemplated with reference to proceedings in Chancery; changes involving an entire revolution in the system of the Masters' offices, and a transfer to those offices from the superior courts, of the management of administrative suits.

The system adopted in proceedings in Chancery is admirable, taken with reference to the subjects for which it was originally destined. But, in the course of time, the jurisdiction of Chancery has, from the extent and flexibility of its powers, and the absence of any other jurisdiction possessing sufficient attributes, been extended to subjects for which it was not originally destined, and for which many of the peculiarities of its procedure are totally unnecessary. At the same time, the class of interests, in reference to which the jurisdiction of Chancery is the only one that the institutions of this country provide for the administration of justice, has become so extended, that a large portion of the business of Chancery now consists of suits of a character requiring, it is true, to be dealt with according to the principles of equity, but not requiring at all the peculiar machinery of equity procedure. And of subjects for suits of this class, an infinite number is left without the protection of any judicial adjudication, because equity, the only jurisdiction at all adapted to deal with them, is inaccessible by reason of its peculiar procedure.

The principal peculiarities of equity are two, one of principle, the other of procedure. The first consists, speaking, of course, in a very general manner, in this: that equity does not confine itself to the consideration of the absolute legal rights of parties, but treats those rights as held for, or controlled by, the liabilities which, in conscience, the parties have intended mutually to incur. The second, which is, in truth, an inevitable consequence of the first, consists in the practice of compelling the party charged with a wrong, or a liability, to lay open the recesses of his conscience, and divulge all that he knows, or believes, or thinks, in relation to the subject-matter of inquiry. To meet the exigencies of these two features of equity jurisdiction, all the machinery of Chancery proceedings has been calculated, and is thoroughly well adapted: not only is it well adapted for the purpose, but, perhaps, it may be said, that no very different system could be found at all practically effective, and, at the same time, bearable, consistently with the ideas and habits of men living under a free government. But when the same system, with all its guards, and checks, and delays, intended to soften and make tolerable the pressure of its inquisitorial character, comes to be applied to cases where there is no fraud, or suspicion of fraud,—no concealment, or thought of concealment,—no necessity for any exercise of inquisitorial powers on the one hand, or of protective delays on the other;—when, in such cases, the long bill, with its charges and inevitable interrogatories, and the minute answer, with its equally inevitable statements and traversees, almost unavoidably repeating each other under the fear of a possible exception, form the foundation of a suit; and the formal state of facts, and affidavits, and written reports, together with long written petitions to the court upon every trifling matter, and references to the Master to inform the court what it ought to do, form the bulky sequel; then it is impossible not to see that a most unnecessarily cumbrous and tedious mode of proceeding is applied to objects for which it was never intended, and for which it is ill adapted.

Where parties differ about the existence of a contract; where persons filling, or believed to fill, a fiduciary character, assert their absolute title, and refuse to give information which can only be obtained from themselves; where transactions have taken place between men, in which fraud is imputed by the one and denied by the other party;—in these, and the great variety of other instances in which not only are parties hostile to each other, but much that affects the transaction must remain undiscovered, unless the party charged can be put to discharge his conscience by answering a keen inquiry; it is intelligible that a minute string of allegations, followed by an equally minute and inquisitorial string of interrogatories should be necessary; and that all the consequential arrangements of well-considered written evidence, and inquiries addressed to the Masters, and guards against surprise, by the interposition of the court, and the advice and advocacy of counsel at every step, should be not only beneficial, but indispensable, to prevent oppression. But it is not so intelligible how, in a suit in which nothing is required, for instance, but to ascertain who are the persons constituting a particular class described by a testator, or who are the testator's next of kin, and then the decision of the court upon the construction of the will—any useful purpose is answered by a bill, with all the parts of a hostile bill; and several answers; and a hearing, to do nothing but direct the Master to make inquiries; and then inquiries conducted with all the forms of hostile proceedings; and, lastly, a hearing on further directions; the result of the whole being an amount of delay and expense, which effectually prevent the jurisdiction being of any use whatever, where the property in question is not, at the very least, of 500*l.* in value. Suits of this class, and of the purely administrative class, are, it is said, to be entirely withdrawn from the active interference of the court, and are to be wholly disposed of, under a simple order of reference, by the Masters of the Court of Chancery, whose courts are, for that purpose, to be greatly altered in constitution, and to be open to the public. The proposed plans will, doubtless, before long, be brought in detail before Parliament, and till then we shall content ourselves with this brief notice to our equity readers, of the revolutions that they may expect. It cannot be doubted, that alterations in the practice in equity in this direction, if made with even moderate prudence, will be very beneficial to the public; and, while we doubt as little that the great body of the Profession would be ready, for such an object, to make sacrifices, if need be, we do not, at the same time, see any reason to anticipate that a change, simplifying and reducing the expense of proceedings in administrative and amicable suits, would produce any permanently injurious effect upon the status of the Profession.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, Feb. 25.

Mr. Duncombe moved the second reading of a bill for correcting an error in the Friendly Societies Act. The object of the bill is to obviate the effect of that construction of the act, under which it has been held to be confined to societies for mutual relief in sickness, &c.; and it proposes to insert, after the words in the present act, "for any other purpose not illegal," the words, "whether of the same description as hereinbefore mentioned, or otherwise."

The bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Wednesday next.

THE DOCTRINE OF EQUITY AS TO PARTIAL PERFORMANCE OF AN AGREEMENT.

A very recent decision (Rolfe v. Rolfe, ante, p. 61) appears to establish an important distinction in reference to the doctrine of those cases, in which it has been held, that equity will not decree an agreement to be specifically performed, unless it can execute the whole of the agreement, and that, when it cannot execute the whole agreement, it will not restrain by injunction breach of a negative covenant calculated to protect the positive branch of the agreement. (Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333; Kimberley v. Jennings, Id. 340; Hills v. Croll, 9 Jur. 645). The qualification engrafted by Rolfe v. Rolfe, upon the doctrine of these cases, or, to speak more accurately, the distinction shewn by that case to be not inconsistent with them, is this: that, if the agreement is not strictly one entire agreement, but the quasi agreement, constituted by the covenant not to do some particular thing, can be considered as a distinct and separate agreement, and if the bill does not pray specific performance of the compound agreement, but only an injunction to restrain the breach of the negative covenant, then equity may interfere by injunction to enforce that distinct part of the agreement which is protected by a covenant to abstain from doing certain things, although it may see that it has no power to enforce the specific performance of the other part of the agreement, consisting of a positive agreement to do something.

In Kimberley v. Jennings (6 Sim. 340) there were certain stipulations, intended to be of a positive character, but too vaguely expressed to be capable of being specifically executed; and a certain other stipulation in the nature of a covenant not to do particular acts. The court was of opinion, that the two agreements were blended and dependant upon each other; and, therefore, although the bill did not in that case pray specific performance, but only, as in Rolfe v. Rolfe, an injunction to restrain a breach of the covenant, it was held, that such a bill could not be sustained, because, among other reasons, it was not such an agreement as the court could perform in the whole, and, therefore, it could not perform any part of it.

In Kemble v. Kean (6 Sim. 333) the court also appears to have considered the negative provision of the compound agreement, as inseparable from, and a mere auxiliary to, the positive provision. In that case the bill prayed specific performance of the whole agreement, and an injunction in the meantime; so that it is, on both points, distinguishable from Rolfe v. Rolfe.

In the very recent case of Hills v. Croll (9 Jur. 645) the terms of the agreement were expressed in a rather complicated way; but, in substance, it came to this: that Hills agreed to supply Croll with acids, and Croll agreed to purchase from Hills and from no other person. The bill prayed a specific performance of the agreement, and an injunction in the meantime to restrain Croll from purchasing acids from any one but the plaintiff. Lord Lyndhurst said, the court had no power to compel Hills to manufacture acids; and, therefore, as the agreement could not in its entirety be performed, the court would not compel a specific performance by injunction of any part.

Nothing fell from the Lord Chancellor, in Hills v. Croll, to shew that he considered the two branches of the agreement inseparable, or that he attached any importance to the question, whether they were or were not separate. And it may be thought, that, in fact, the two branches of the agreement were as separable as were those of the agreement in Rolfe v. Rolfe; for an agreement between A. and B., that A. shall purchase certain things of B., unless it involves in itself an agreement that B. shall sell them to A., (Pordage v. Cole, 1 Saund. 319 h), does not seem at all necessarily dependant upon any further covenant in the instrument, that B. shall sell to A. It might be the intention of the agreement that A. should undertake, by a distinct covenant, to purchase of B., if he purchased at all, whether B. was bound to sell, or not. However, this question does not seem to have been in any way presented to, or considered by, the court, in Hills v. Croll. But the bill prayed specific performance of the whole agreement, and in that it differs from Rolfe v. Rolfe.

In Hooper v. Brodrick, (11 Sim. 47), which was cited in Rolfe v. Rolfe, the point did not arise. That was not a case in which there was a positive covenant to do something, protected by a negative covenant that the covenantor should not do acts inconsistent with the performance of the positive agreement; but a case in which there was merely a positive covenant by the assignee of premises used as an inn, that he would use and keep open the premises as an inn. There was, it is true, a negative covenant, that he should not do any act whereby a license might be forfeited or refused; but that, it is obvious, was not a covenant intended to enforce the actual performance of the covenant to use the house as an inn, but only to enforce his taking care that it should not become impossible for him to use the house according to the covenant; and that was the point upon which the judgment turned. The court held, that it could not enjoin the defendant from not keeping the house open as an inn, which would have been ordering him to keep it open as an inn; but held, that it could restrain him from doing acts which would make it impossible for him to perform his positive covenant.

It certainly is difficult to avoid the impression, that, in Rolfe v. Rolfe, the court was struggling to find some distinction, to enable it to escape from the doctrine of the preceding cases. For the agreement by the plaintiffs to employ the defendant as a cutter, which was treated by the court as a separate agreement, was expressed to be in pursuance and further performance of the said agreement, and in consideration of the premises; and, on looking back to the commencement of the instrument, we find that the agreement was, that, in consideration of certain pecuniary equivalents, the plaintiff's father and his brother were to assign their shares in the partnership business to the plaintiff; and the covenant by the defendant not to carry on trade on his own account, was in consideration of the premises, as well as the subsequent agreement by the plaintiff to employ him. It may be contended, therefore, that all the three stipulations, viz. the stipulation for a pecuniary payment, the stipulation that the defendant should not carry on business on his own account, and the stipulation that he should be employed, formed together one consideration of one agreement. The principle of the decision is, however, unaffected by the question, whether the agreements were or not, in fact, distinct; the court having decided the case upon the assumption that they were so, and holding, that, where the two branches of an apparently single agreement are, in substance, distinct, and the bill does not pray specific performance of the whole agreement, but only an injunction to restrain the breach of the negative agreement, the court has jurisdiction to grant such an injunction, notwithstanding the doctrine of Kimberley v. Jennings, Kean v. Kemble, and Hills v. Croll.

The necessary precaution to be kept in view in framing agreements of this sort will, therefore, in future, be to keep the two branches of the agreement, if two branches there must be, as independent as possible; and the struggle, in taking existing cases out of the inconvenient, and, as we humbly venture to think, most inequitable, doctrine of Kemble v. Kean and Kimberley v. Jennings, will be to shew that the intention was not to make the negative covenant protect the positive one, which would be to connect them; but that the positive one was meant to enforce some act, and the negative one to prevent the doing of certain other acts, inconsistent (of their own merits, and quite irrespectively of the doing or not doing of the first act) with the views of the parties. It will, we apprehend, be more frequently found practicable to use the precaution with reference to future instruments, than to succeed in the argument with reference to existing ones.

ON DESCENT AMONGST COPARCENERS.

The attention of the writer of these remarks has been very recently drawn to a point in the law of descent amongst coparceners, on which, in his opinion, an erroneous doctrine has been propagated.

The point in question is as follows:—Suppose a man to be the purchaser of freehold land, and to die seised of it intestate, leaving two daughters, (say Susanna and Catherine), but no sons. It is clear that the land will then descend to the two daughters, Susanna and Catherine, in equal shares as coparceners. Let us now suppose that the daughter Catherine dies intestate and without having disposed of her moiety in her lifetime, leaving issue one son. Under these circumstances, (supposing the decease of Catherine to have taken place on or after the 1st January, 1834), the question arises, to whom shall the inheritance descend? The act to amend the law of inheritance enacts, "that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser." In this case Catherine is clearly not the purchaser, but her father; and the descent of Catherine's moiety is accordingly to be traced from him. Who, then, as to this moiety, is his heir? Supposing that, instead of the moiety in question, some other land were, after Catherine's decease, to be given to the heir of her father, such heir would clearly be Susanna, the surviving daughter, as to one moiety of the land, and the son of Catherine as to the other moiety. It has been argued, then, that the moiety which belonged to Catherine, by descent from her father, must, on her decease, descend to the heir of her father, in the same manner as other land would have done had she been dead in her father's lifetime; that is to say, that one moiety of Catherine's moiety will descend to her surviving sister Susanna, and the other moiety of Catherine's moiety will descend to her son. This view of the case appears to have been first promulgated by a writer in the Law Magazine, in a review of the last edition of Sir Edward Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, (23 Law Mag. 279). It was afterwards sanctioned by Mr. Hayes, who states the same doctrine in the last edition of his valuable introduction to conveyancing, (1 Hayes's Conv. 314). It appears again in Mr. Sweet's edition of Messrs. Jarman and Bythewood's Conveyancing, (vol. 1, p. 139), where an argument of considerable length will be found in support of it; and it has been subsequently adopted by Mr. Joshua Williams in his Principles of the Law of Real Property, p. 80. With deference to those gentlemen, the writer contends, that, on the decease of Catherine, her moiety will not descend equally between her surviving sister and her own son, but will descend entirely to her son.

In order to arrive at our conclusion, it will be necessary to inquire, first, into the course of descent of an estate tail, under the circumstances above described, according to the old law; secondly, into the course of descent of an estate in fee simple, according to the old law, supposing the circumstances as above described, with this qualification, that neither Susanna nor Catherine shall be considered to have obtained any actual seisin of the lands. And, when these two points shall have been satisfactorily ascertained, we shall then be in a better position to place a correct interpretation on the act by which the old law of inheritance has been endeavoured to be amended.

First, then, as to the course of descent of an estate tail according to the old law. Let us suppose lands to have been given to the purchaser and the heirs of his body. On his decease his two daughters, Susanna and Catherine, are clearly the heirs of his body, and as such will accordingly have become tenants in tail each of a moiety. Now, there is no proposition more frequently asserted in the old books than this: that the descent of an estate tail is per formam doni to the heirs of the body of the donee. On the decease of one heir of the body, the estate descends not to the heir of such heir, but to the heir of the body of the original donee per formam doni. Suppose, then, that Catherine should die, her moiety would clearly have descended, by the old law, to the heir of the body of her father, the original donee in tail. Whom, then, under the above circumstances, did the law consider to be the heir of his body quoad this moiety? The Tenures of Littleton, as explained by Lord Coke's Commentary, supply us with an answer. Littleton says, "Also, if lands or tenements be given to a man in tail who hath as much land in fee simple, and hath issue two daughters, and die, and his two daughters make partition between them, so as the land in fee simple is allotted to the younger daughter, in allowance for the lands and tenements in tail allotted to the elder daughter; if, after such partition made, the younger daughter alieneth her land in fee simple to another in fee, and hath issue a son or daughter, and dies, the issue may enter into the lands in tail, and hold and occupy them in purparty with her aunt." (Litt., sect. 260). On this case Lord Coke makes the following comment:—"The eldest coparcener hath, by the partition, and the matter subsequent, barred herself of her right in the fee-simple lands, insomuch as when the youngest sister alieneth the fee-simple lands and dieth, and her issue entereth into half the lands entailed, yet shall not the eldest sister enter into half of the lands in fee simple upon the alienee." (Co. Litt. 172. b.) It is evident, therefore, that Lord Coke, though well acquainted with the rule that an estate tail should descend per formam doni, yet never for a moment supposed, that, on the decease of the younger daughter, her moiety would descend half to her sister, and half to her issue; for he presumes, of course, that the issue would enter into half the lands entailed, that is, into the whole of the moiety of the lands which had originally belonged to their mother. After the decease of the younger sister, the heirs of the body of her father were no doubt the elder sister and the issue of the younger; but, as to the moiety which had belonged to the younger sister, this, as clearly, was not the case: the heir of the body of the father to inherit this moiety was exclusively the issue of such younger daughter, who were entitled to the whole of it in the place of their parent. This incidental allusion of Lord Coke is as strong, if not stronger, than a direct assertion by him of the doctrine; for it seems to shew that a doubt on the subject never entered into his mind.

At the end of the section of Littleton to which we have referred, it is stated that the contrary is holden M., 10 Hen. 6, scil., that the heir may not enter upon the parcener who hath the entailed land, but is put to a formedon. On this Lord Coke remarks, (Co. Litt. 173. a.), that it is no part of Littleton, and is contrary to law, and that the case is not truly vouched, for it is not in 10 Hen. 6, but in 20 Hen. 6, and yet there is but the opinion of Newton, obiter, by the way. On referring to the case in the Year Books, it appears that Yelverton contended, that, if the sister who had the fee simple aliened, and had issue, and died, the issue would be barred from the land entailed by the partition, which would be a mischief. To this Newton replied, "No sir; but he shall have formedon, and shall recover the half." (Year Book, 20 Hen. 6, 14 a). Newton, therefore, though wrong in supposing that a formedon was necessary, thought, equally with Lord Coke, that a moiety of the land was the share to be recovered. This appears to be the Newton whom Littleton calls (sect. 729) "my master Sir Richard Newton, late Chief Justice of the Common Pleas."

There is another section in Littleton, which, though not conclusive, yet strongly tends in the same direction; namely, section 255, where it is said, that, if the tenements whereof two parceners make partition "be to them in fee tail, and the part of the one is better in yearly value than the part of the other, albeit they be concluded during their lives to defeat the partition, yet, if the parcener who hath the lesser part in value hath issue and die, the issue may disagree to the partition, and enter and occupy in common the other part which was allotted to her aunt, and so the other may enter and occupy in common the other part allotted to her sister, &c., as if no partition had been made." Had the law been, that, on the decease of one sister, her issue were entitled only to an undivided fourth part, it seems strange that Littleton should not have stated that they might enter into a fourth only, and that the other sister might occupy the remaining three-fourths.

In addition to these authorities, there is a modern case, which, when attentively considered, is a clear authority on the same side; namely, Doe d. Gregory and Geere v. Whichelo, (8 T. R. 211). This case, so far as it relates to the point in question, was as follows:—Richard Lemmon was tenant in tail of certain premises, and died, leaving issue by his first wife one son, Richard, and a daughter, Martha, and, by his second wife, three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Grace. Richard Lemmon the son, as heir of the body of his father, was clearly tenant in tail of the whole premises during his life. He died, however, without issue, leaving his sister Martha of the whole blood, and his three sisters of the half blood, him surviving. Martha then intermarried with John Whichelo, and afterwards died, leaving John Whichelo the defendant her eldest son and heir of her body. John Whichelo the defendant then entered into the whole of the premises, under the impression, that, as he was heir to Richard Lemmon the son, he was entitled to the whole. In this, however, he was clearly mistaken; for the descent of an estate tail is, as we have said, traced from the purchaser, or first donee in tail, per formam doni. The heirs of the purchaser, Richard Lemmon the father, were clearly his four daughters, or their issue; for the daughters by the second wife, though of the half blood to their brother by the former wife, were, equally with their half-sister Martha, of the whole blood to their common father. The only question then is, in what shares the daughters or their issue became entitled. At the time of the ejectment all the daughters were dead. Elizabeth was dead without issue, whereupon her one equal fourth part devolved, without dispute, on her three sisters, Martha, Anne, and Grace: each of these, therefore, became entitled to one equal third part. Martha, as we have seen, died, leaving John Whichelo the defendant her eldest son and heir of her body. Anne died, leaving James Gregory, one of the lessors of the plaintiff, her grandson and heir of her body; and Grace died, leaving Diones Geere, the other lessor of the plaintiff, her only son and heir of her body. Under these circumstances, an action of ejectment was brought by James Gregory and Diones Geere for two equal third parts of the premises; and they obtained a verdict accordingly for two equal third parts, and neither more nor less. Neither the counsel engaged in the cause, nor the court, seem for a moment to have imagined that they could have been entitled to any other shares. It is evident, therefore, that the court supposed, that, on the decease of Martha, the heir of the body of the purchaser, as to her share, was her son, John Whichelo the defendant; that, on the decease of Anne, the heir of the body of the purchaser, as to her share, was James Gregory, her grandson; and that, on the decease of Grace, the heir of the body of the purchaser, as to her share, was her son, Diones Geere. On no other supposition can the judgment be accounted for, which awarded one-third of the whole to the defendant John Whichelo, one other third to James Gregory, and the remaining third to Diones Geere. For, let us suppose, that, on the decease of each coparcener, her one-third was divided equally amongst the then existing heirs of the body of the purchaser; and the result will be, that the parties, instead of each being entitled to one-third, would have been entitled in fractional shares of a most complicated kind; unless we presume, which is next to impossible, that all the three daughters died at one and the same moment. It is not stated, in the report of the case, in what order the decease of the daughters took place; but, according to the principle suggested, it will appear, on working out the fractions, that the heir of the one who died first would have been entitled to the largest share, and the heir of the one who died last would have been entitled to the smallest. Thus, let us suppose that Martha died first, then Anne, and then Grace. On the decease of Martha, according to the principle suggested, her son, John Whichelo, would have taken only one-third of her share, or one-ninth of the whole, and Anne and Grace, the surviving sisters, would each also have taken one-third of the share of Martha, in addition to their own one-third of the whole. The shares would then have stood thus: John Whichelo $\frac{1}{9}$, Anne $\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9}$, Grace $\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9}$. Anne now dies. Her share, according to the same principle, would be equally divisible amongst her own issue, James Gregory, and the other heirs of the body of the purchaser, namely, John Whichelo and Grace. The shares would then stand thus: John Whichelo, $\frac{1}{9} + \frac{1}{9} (\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9})$; namely, his own share and one-third of Anne's share, $= \frac{2}{9}$. James Gregory, $\frac{1}{9} (\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9}) = \frac{1}{27}$; Grace, $\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9} + \frac{1}{9} (\frac{1}{3} + \frac{1}{9})$; namely, her own share and one-third of Anne's share, $= \frac{16}{27}$. Lastly, Grace dies, and her share, according to the same principle, would be equally divisible between her own issue Diones Geere and John Whichelo and James Gregory, the other co-heirs of the body of the purchaser. The shares would then have stood thus: John Whichelo $\frac{2}{9} + \frac{1}{9} \times \frac{1}{3}$; namely, his own share and $\frac{1}{9}$ of Grace's share, $= \frac{7}{27}$ of the entirety of the land. James Gregory $\frac{1}{27} + \frac{1}{9} \times \frac{1}{3}$; namely, his own share and one-third of Grace's share, $= \frac{4}{27}$. Diones Geere, $\frac{1}{9} \times \frac{1}{3} = \frac{1}{27}$. On the principle, therefore, of the descent of the share of each coparcener amongst the co-heirs of the body of the purchaser for the time being, the heir of the body of the one who died first would have been entitled to thirty-seven eighty-first parts of the whole premises; the heir of the body of the one who died next would have been entitled to twenty-eight eighty-first parts; and the heir of the body of the one who died last would have been entitled only to sixteen eighty-first parts. By the judgment of the court, however, the lessors of the plaintiff were entitled each to one equal third part; thus shewing, that, although the descent of an estate tail under the old law was always traced from the purchaser, (otherwise John Whichelo would have been entitled to the whole), yet this rule was qualified by another rule of equal force, namely, that all the lineal descendants of any person deceased should represent their ancestor, that is, should stand in the same place, and take the same share, as the ancestor would have done if living.

2. Let us now inquire into the course of descent of an estate in fee simple, according to the old law, in case the purchaser should have died, leaving two daughters, Susanna and Catherine, neither of whom should have obtained any actual seisin of the lands; and that one of them (say Catherine) should afterwards have died, leaving issue one son. In this case, it is admitted on all sides, that the share of Catherine would have descended to the heir of the purchaser, and not to her own heir, in the character of heir to her; for the maxim was seisina facit stipitem. Had either of the daughters obtained actual seisin, her seisin would have been in law the actual seisin of her sister also; and, on the decease of either of them, her share would have descended not to the heir of her father, but to her own heir, the seisin acquired having made her the stock of descent. In such a case, therefore, the title of the son of Catherine to the whole of his mother's moiety would have been indisputable; for, while he was living, no one else could possibly have been her heir. The supposition, however, on which we are now to proceed is, that neither of the daughters ever obtained any actual seisin; and the question to be solved is, to whom, on the death of Catherine, did her share descend; whether equally between her sister and her son, as being together heir to the purchaser; or whether solely to the son, as being heir to the purchaser quoad his mother's share. In Mr. Sweet's valuable edition of Messrs. Jarman and Bythewood's Conveyancing, (vol. 1, p. 139), it is stated to be "apprehended that the share of the deceased sister would have descended in the same manner as by the recent statute it will now descend in every instance," which manner of descent is explained to be, one-half of the share, or a quarter of the whole only, to the son, and the remaining half of the share to the surviving sister, thus giving her three-quarters of the whole. This doctrine, however, the writer submits, is erroneous; and, in proof of such error, it might be sufficient, simply, to call to mind the fact, that the law of England had but one rule for the discovery of the heir. The heirs of a purchaser were, first, the heirs of his body, and then his collateral heirs; and an estate tail was merely an estate restricted in its descent to lineal heirs. If, therefore, the heir of a person had been discovered for the purpose of the descent of an estate tail, it is obvious that the same individual would also be heir of the same person for the purpose of the descent of an estate in fee simple. No distinction between the two is ever mentioned by Lord Coke or any of the old authorities. Now, we have seen that the heir of the purchaser, under the circumstances above mentioned, for the purpose of inheriting an estate tail, was the son of the deceased daughter solely, quoad the share which such daughter had held; and it would accordingly appear that the heir of the purchaser, to inherit an estate in fee simple, was also the son of the deceased daughter quoad her share. That this was, in fact, the case, appears incidentally from a passage in the Year Books, (35 Hen. 6. 23), where it is stated, that, "If there be two coparceners of a reversion, and their tenant for term of life commits waste, and then one of the parceners has issue and dies, and the tenant for term of life commits another waste, and the aunt and the niece bring a writ of waste jointly, for they cannot sever, and the writ of waste is general, still their recovery shall be special; for the aunt shall recover treble damages for the waste done, as well in the life of her parcener as afterwards, and the niece shall only recover damages for the waste done after the death of her mother, and the place wasted they shall recover jointly. And the same law is, if a man has issue two daughters, and dies seized of certain land, and a stranger abates, and afterwards one of the daughters has issue two daughters and dies, and the aunt and the two daughters bring assize of mort d' ancestor; here, if the aunt recover the moiety of the land and damages from the death of the ancestor, and the nieces recover each one of them the moiety of the moiety of the land, and damages from the death of their mother, still the writ is general." Here we have all the circumstances required; the father dies seised, leaving two daughters, neither of whom obtains any actual seisin of the land; for a stranger abates, that is, gets possession before them. One of the daughters then dies, without ever having had possession, and her share devolves entirely on her issue, not as heirs to her, for she never was seised, but as heirs to her father quoad her share. The surviving sister is entitled only to her original moiety, and the two daughters of her deceased sister take the mother's moiety equally between them.

There is another incidental reference to the same subject in Lord Coke's Commentary upon Littleton, (Co. Litt. 164. a.): "If a man hath issue two daughters, and is disseised, and the daughters have issue and die, the issues shall join in a præcipe, because one right descends from the ancestor, and it maketh no difference whether the common ancestor, being out of possession, died before the daughters or after, for that, in both cases, they must make themselves heirs to the grandfather which was last seised, and, when the issues have recovered, they are coparceners, and one præcipe shall lie against them." "It maketh no difference," says Lord Coke, "whether the common ancestor, being out of possession, died before the daughters or after." Lord Coke is certainly not here speaking of the shares which the issue would take; but, had any difference in the quantity of their shares been made by the circumstance of the daughters surviving their father, it seems strange that so accurate a writer as Lord Coke should not "herein" have "noted a diversity." The descent is traced to the issue of the daughters not from the daughters, but from their father, the common grandfather of the issue. On the decease of one daughter, therefore, on the theory against which we are contending, the right to her share should have devolved, one-half on her own issue and the other half on her surviving sister; and, on the decease of such surviving sister, her three-quarters should, by the same rule, have been divided, one-half to her own issue and the other half to the issue of her deceased sister; whereas it is admitted, that, had the daughters both died in their father's lifetime, their issue would have inherited in equal shares. Lord Coke, however, remarks no difference whether the father died before or after his daughters. Surely, then, he never could have imagined that so great an inequality in the shares could have been produced by so mere an accident. It should be remembered that the rule of representation for which we are contending is the rule suggested by natural justice, and might well have been passed over without express notice; but, had the opposite rule prevailed, the inequality and injustice of its operation could scarcely have failed to elicit some remark. This circumstance may, perhaps, tend to explain the fact that the writer has been unable, after a lengthened search, to find any authority expressly directed to the point; and yet, when we consider that in ancient times the title by descent was the most usual one, (testamentary alienation not having been permitted), we cannot doubt but that the point in question must very frequently have occurred. In what manner, then, can we account for the silence of our ancient writers on this subject, but on the supposition, which is confirmed by every incidental notice, that, in tracing descent from a purchaser, the issue of a deceased daughter took the entire share of their parent, whether such daughter should have died in the lifetime of the purchaser or after his decease?

Having now ascertained the course of descent among coparceners under the old law, whenever descent was traced from a purchaser, we are in a better situation to place a construction on that clause of the act to amend the law of inheritance, which enacts, "that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser." (Stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, s. 2). What was the nature of the alteration which this act was intended to effect? Was it intended to introduce a course of descent amongst coparceners, hitherto unknown to the law, and tending to the most intricate and absurd subdivision of their shares? or did the act intend merely to say that descent from the purchaser, which had hitherto occurred only in the case of an estate tail, and in the case where the heir to a fee simple died without obtaining actual seisin, should now apply to every case? In other words, has the act abolished the rule, that, in tracing the descent from the purchaser, the issue of deceased heirs shall stand, quoad their entire shares, in the place of their parents? We have seen, that, previously to the act, the rule that descent should be traced from the purchaser, whenever it applied, was guided and governed by another rule, that the issue of every deceased person should, quoad the entire share of such person, stand in his or her place. Why, then, should not the same rule of representation govern descent, now that the rule tracing descent from the purchaser has become applicable to every case? Had any modification been intended to be made of so important a rule for tracing descent from a purchaser, as the rule that the issue, and the issue alone, represent their ancestor, surely the act would not have been silent on the subject. A rule of law clearly continues in force until it be repealed. No repeal has taken place of the rule, that, in tracing descent from a purchaser, the issue shall always stand in the place of their ancestor. It is submitted, therefore, that this rule is now in full operation; and that, although in every case descent is now traced from the purchaser, yet the tracing of such descent is still governed by the rules to which the tracing of descent from purchasers was in former times invariably subject. If this be so, it is clear, then, that, under the circumstances stated at the commencement of this paper, the share of Catherine will descend entirely to her own issue, as heir to the purchaser quoad her share, and will not be divided between such issue and the surviving sister.

It is said, indeed, that, by giving to the issue one-half of the share which belonged to their mother, the rule is satisfied, which requires that the issue of a person deceased shall, in all cases, represent their ancestor; for it is argued that the issue still take one-fourth by representation, notwithstanding that the other fourth goes to the surviving sister, who constitutes, together with such issue, one heir to their common ancestor. This, however, is a fallacy; the rule is, "that the lineal descendants in infinitum of any person deceased shall represent their ancestor, that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living." (2 Black. Com. 216). Now, in what place would the deceased daughter have stood had she been living? Would she have been heir to one-fourth only, or would she not rather have been heir to the entire moiety? Clearly to the entire moiety; for, had she been living, no descent of her moiety would have taken place: if, then, her issue are to stand in the place which she would have occupied if living, they cannot so represent her unless they take the whole of her share.

But it is said, again, that the surviving daughter may have aliened her share; and how can the descent of her deceased sister's share be said to be traced from the purchaser, if the survivor, who constitutes a part of the purchaser's heir, is to take nothing? The descent of the whole, it is argued, cannot be considered as traced over again on the decease of any daughter, because the other daughter's moiety may, by that time, have got into the hands of a perfect stranger. The proper reply to this objection seems to be, that the laws of descent were prior in date to the liberty of alienation. In ancient times, when the rules of descent were settled, the objection could scarcely have occurred. Estates tail were kept from alienation by virtue of the Statute De Donis, for about 200 years subsequent to its passing.

Rights of entry and action were also inalienable for a very much longer period. Reversions expectant on estates of freehold, in the descent of which the same rule of tracing from the purchaser occurred, could alone have afforded an instance of alienation by the heir; and the sale of reversions appears to have been by no means frequent in early times. In addition to other reasons, the attornment then required from the particular tenant on every alienation of a reversion, operated as a check on such transactions. It may, therefore, be safely asserted as a general proposition, that, on the decease of any coparcener, the descent of whose share was to be traced from the purchaser, the shares of the other coparceners had not been aliened; and to have given them any part of their deceased sister's share, to the prejudice of her own issue, would have been obviously unfair, and contrary to the natural meaning of the rule, that "every daughter hath a several stock or root." (Co. Litt. 164. b.) If, as we have seen, the rule remained the same with regard to estates tail, notwithstanding the introduction of the right of alienation, (Doe v. Whitchelo, ante), surely it ought still to continue unimpaired, now that it has become applicable to estates in fee, which enjoy a still more perfect liberty. Rules of law, which have their foundation in natural justice, should ever be upheld, notwithstanding they may have become applicable to cases not specifically contemplated at the time of their creation.

The writer is one, who, until he had occasion to search narrowly into the authorities, held the opinion he now opposes. He has, therefore, no right to dogmatise; but, if the authorities and reasoning above detailed should have produced the same effect on the mind of the reader, as they have on that of the writer, they will have created a clear conviction, that, with respect to the point above discussed, the mischief and inconvenience which have been attributed to the act, have, in reality, no existence. CRABB'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 21. 18s. boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY in ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABB, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

LONDON, MARCH 7, 1846.

THE case of Winterbottom v. Ingham (reported in one of our late Numbers, p. 4) deserves to be noticed here, as deciding a question of considerable importance, and, probably, of frequent occurrence.

The defendant had, in August, 1835, become the purchaser, by auction, of certain estates, for the sum of 1760*l.*, and had paid to the plaintiff, who was receiver under an order of the Court of Chancery, a deposit of 10*l.* per cent. By the conditions of sale, the residue of the purchase-money was to be paid on the 24th June then next, and the purchaser was then to have actual possession, and, in default of payment of the residue of the purchase-money, was to pay interest on it from that day. About a fortnight after the sale the defendant was let into possession by the plaintiff, without any stipulation as to the terms of occupation, and, having refused to complete the purchase, a suit in Chancery was instituted, the result of which was, that, upon the Master reporting that the plaintiff could not make a good title, the bill was dismissed.

The action was brought for the use and occupation of the premises from the time when the defendant was let into possession, until after the determination of the Chancery suit. Former cases, in which the point had been touched upon, and they were but few, afforded no decisive authority, and it appeared to be the first time that the question, whether, under circumstances such as are mentioned above, a purchaser is liable to an action for use and occupation, had required to be expressly decided.

In Hearn v. Tomlin, (Peake's N. P. C. 192), Lord Kenyon had denied the liability; but there the occupation had occasioned loss, not benefit, to the defendant. In Kirland v. Pownett, (2 Taunt. 145), Mansfield, C. J., at the trial, at first inclined to think that the action might be supported; but, upon the ground, that, during all the defendant's occupation of the premises, the plaintiff had been in possession of the purchase-money, of which he had made, or might have made, interest, he directed a nonsuit, which the court afterwards unanimously held to be right, apparently for the above reason, though it is curious, that, at the conclusion of the judgment, we find stated the true principle, and that which was acted upon in the late case, viz. that a contract cannot arise by implication of law, under circumstances the occurrence of which neither of the parties ever had in their contemplation.

Hall v. Vaughan, (6 Price, 157), though the reasons by which the court justified the setting aside the nonsuit apparently afford an authority in favour of the liability, does not, in fact, involve the point now in discussion. In Howard v. Shaw, (8 Mees. & W. 118), the defendant was let into possession of premises, under a contract of purchase, which was not completed: having demanded back his deposit from the auctioneer, and being able to obtain only part, he kept possession of part of the premises, by way of indemnity against his loss, and retained it, without paying any rent, until served with a declaration in ejectment. The action was brought for use and occupation for the period after the contract was abandoned. The court held, that the defendant was liable. As a decision, this case is not applicable to the present; but the following remarks of two of the judges are so:—"While the defendant occupied under a valid contract for the sale of the property to him, he could not be considered as a tenant; the parties could not convert the contract for purchase into a contract of tenancy, nor, while the former was pending, into another of a different nature. Here it may be assumed that he (the defendant) entered into possession under the agreement for sale, which has since been carried into effect by the completion of the sale."

may be some difficulty in saying, that, while that agreement existed, the relation of landlord and tenant subsisted between the parties; although this case differs in its circumstances from Kirtland v. Pomsett, because, here, a rent is charged upon the premises. I quite agree, however, that, while the agreement subsisted, the defendant was not bound to pay a compensation for the occupation of the land, because the contract shews that he was to occupy without compensation, and, so long as it subsisted, he was entitled so to occupy, but still he was tenant at will."

In this state of the authorities the action of Winterbottom v. Ingham was brought; and Chief Justice Tindal, before whom it was tried, being of opinion that the action was not maintainable, directed a verdict for the defendant, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for the amount which it was agreed was the value of the defendant's occupation. Upon the case being brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, they confirmed the decision of the Chief Justice. The plaintiff's counsel had contended, that, the entry of the defendant having taken place before the purchase-money was paid, it could not be referable to the contract of sale, with the terms of which it was inconsistent; and that both the "entry and occupation must be referred to a distinct contract, arising upon the ordinary implication, and involving the ordinary consequences as to the payment of compensation." But the Court said, "The more correct view of these facts seems to us to be, that the entry and possession were not upon an understanding that any compensation was to be made in the event which has arisen. The defendant certainly was considered, both by himself and the plaintiff, as purchaser, and not as tenant; and the plaintiff cannot convert him into an occupier, liable to pay for his occupation, by his own wrongful act in not completing the contract of sale. The jury have, indeed, found that the occupation was beneficial; but this statement is not without ambiguity: it may have been beneficial, supposing that he had actually become the owner, by making a fair return of profit on all his outlay; but it may also have been a very losing concern, on a balance struck between that outlay and the amount of the proceeds during the time of his actual holding. On the other hand, he may have expended as owner, in improvements, a sum much larger than a reasonable rent. How is this account to be taken, or this balance to be struck? A court of equity may have means for doing justice in this respect between the parties; our courts, certainly, have none. Therefore, though the true answer to Mr. Whitehurst's first two questions may be in the affirmative, admitting the defendant's occupation and the plaintiff's permission to occupy, a negative must be put on his third proposition, that the defendant promised to pay, because both parties understood that he made no such promise. Parties may easily secure themselves, by stipulating for the event of a non-completion of the purchase in their contract of sale and purchase."

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed the following gentlemen Masters Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery:—William Handsley Podmore, of Sparkbrook, near Birmingham; Edward Russell Ingram, of Stourport, Worcestershire; Henry Lovibond, of Bridgwater, Somersetshire.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF HARTON v. HARTON, (7 Term Rep. 652).

A question arose in a very recent case, (Brown v. Whiteway, V. C. Wigram, 20th Feb., 1846), which will shortly be reported in our pages, whether, under a devise to trustees for various successive interests, some of which require the legal estate to be in the trustees, and others permit of the legal estate being executed in the cestuis que use, the legal estate can shift backwards and forwards, out of and into the trustees; or whether the legal freehold, if it is necessary that it should be in the trustees at all, to support several equitable estates, separated by estates of which the legal estate might, if they stood alone, be in the cestuis que use, must remain in them throughout. It was argued on the one side, that, though the legal estate may vest in trustees for any number of successive equitable estates, and then pass out of them when all the estates of the remaining series are of such a nature as to admit of the legal estate being in the cestuis que use; yet, when once the legal estate has passed out of trustees, it cannot pass back to them, and, therefore, until all the interests necessarily equitable are exhausted, the legal estate must remain in the trustees. It was urged on the other side, that there is no reason why, in such a case, the uses capable of being executed should not be executed, as they arise, in the cestuis que use, and be executed, during the intervening equitable estates, in the trustees. That it is no more, in effect, than a devise to trustees to the use of themselves, during a certain equitable estate, remainder to the use of certain other persons for the duration of certain other partial estates, remainder to the use of the trustees during other equitable estates, and so on; a series of limitations which, if created in terms, would unquestionably be good.

The case was decided on the authority of Harton v. Harton, (7 Term Rep. 652), which the Vice-Chancellor thought not distinguishable from the principal case; and his Honor said, that he could not, on such a point, which was purely legal, overrule, upon demurrer, a case decided at law.

In Harton v. Harton the devise was to trustees and their heirs, on trust to permit a feme covert to take the rents; remainder to the use of her first and other sons in tail; in default of such issue, upon trust to permit another feme covert to take the rents, remainder to the use of her sons in tail, with divers other remainders over, and an ultimate remainder to the testator's right heirs. The limitations, therefore, were undoubtedly to the same effect as in Brown v. Whiteway. It does not, however, appear clear, from the opinion delivered by the Chief Justice, (Lord Kenyon), that the question whether the legal estate may pass and re-pass to and from the trustees was considered by the court, and it is quite clear that it was not raised in the argument of the counsel for the plaintiff. The question seems rather to have been, whether the legal estate could be in a feme covert cestui que use for her life; and it seems to have been taken for granted either that the legal estate was, of necessity, altogether in the trustees, or that the whole series of limitations was a series of uses executed in the cestuis que use. For La w, for the plaintiff, cited South v. Alaine, (Salk. 228), and said, that that was the only case like the principal case, on which he could build an argument in favour of the plaintiff. Now, in South v. Alaine, the only question was, whether a devise of the rents and profits of real estate to a feme covert during her natural life, to be paid by her executors into her own hands, without the intermeddling of her husband, with a devise over of the lands, gave the feme covert the lands; and it was held that she took the lands. This doctrine it was that the court overruled; and Lord Kenyon, C. J., said, "Whether there be a use in the trustees, or not, must depend upon the intention of the deviser, which is to be collected from the will. This provision, it appears, was made in order to secure to the several femes covertæ a separate allowance, free from the control of their husbands, to effectuate which it is essentially necessary that the trustees take the estate with the use executed, otherwise the husband of each taker would be entitled to receive the profits, and so defeat the very object that the deviser had in view."

The allusion of Lawrence, J., to the case of Lord Say and Sele, (1 Eq. Abr. 383), and the observation of Lord Kenyon, that that was a case by itself, may, indeed, lead to the inference, that those learned judges had in view the question, whether the necessity of the legal estate being in the trustees, for the support of a particular equitable interest, required it to be in them throughout; but it is by no means clear that that question was fully brought under their consideration. If it was, their view of the matter labours, at least, under the disadvantage of the implied disapprobation of a judge, whose very doubts have long been, and still are, treated with great respect.

In Hawkins v. Luscombe, (2 Swans. 375), before Lord Eldon, the devise was to trustees and their heirs, upon trust to permit Mrs. Manning and others to take the rents and profits in recompense of the maintenance of J. L. Manning, son of Mrs. Manning, till he attained twenty-one, or died; and, subject thereto, to the use of the trustees and their heirs, upon trusts for accumulation for J. L. Manning until he should attain twenty-one, or die; and, after he should attain twenty-one, to the use of him and his assigns for his life, he taking the name of Luscombe; remainder to the use of the trustees to support contingent remainders; remainder to his first and other sons in tail male, taking the name of Luscombe, with several other remainders; and then a remainder to the use of the trustees and their heirs, for the separate use of Mrs. Manning during her life; and then other remainders over; and a proviso for forfeiture, in the event of any person required to take the name of Luscombe not doing so, and within a specified time obtaining an act of Parliament for changing his name. Upon a question as to the effect of this clause of forfeiture, Sir S. Romilly said that the plaintiffs were not in a position to try the question at law, because the whole legal estate was in the trustees. "It is true," he said, "the express trust is only till the defendant attains twenty-one; but, the whole legal fee having been conveyed to them, (the trustees), to the use of them and their heirs, subsequent words, denoting an intention to vest the legal fee in other persons, cannot have that effect." But Lord Eldon doubted whether the whole legal estate was in the trustees, unless the condition was broken. The precise effect of his Lordship's doubt is not very measurable; but it is enough, at any rate, to shew, that, even where the language of the limitation was, to the use of the trustees and their heirs, language which, Lord Eldon said, was very important, that was not enough to make it clear that there might not be an execution of the use in J. L. Manning, (the first beneficial owner to whom a use was limited in terms), assuming his estate not to be removed by forfeiture, although there were subsequent estates, which, being for the separate use of married women, would require the legal estate to be in the trustees.

Mr. Jarman has observed, upon Harton v. Harton, (Willis, vol. 2, p. 222), "that, perhaps, it is not strictly accurate to say, that in that case a fee in the trustees was necessary to secure the beneficial interest to the femes covertæ; for, though the trusts in favour of the second and third women could not arise until the failure of the objects of the intervening limitations in tail, yet still they must inevitably take effect, if at all, in their lifetime; and the fact, that, in reaching them, the estate necessarily comprehended the objects of the intervening limitations, with regard to whom no purpose was to be answered requiring that the trustees should take an estate, might seem to be no reason for extending that estate to the limitations subsequent to the gifts to the several femes covertæ."

From these observations, Mr. Jarman would seem to imply, that the trustees must, at least, take the legal estate, until the last estate requiring the legal estate to be in them is exhausted. But the real question seems to be, as suggested by the arguments in Brown v. Whiteway, whether the supposed necessity for the legal estate being altogether in or altogether out of the trustees, is not a purely imaginary necessity, uncalled for either by any rule of law, or by any real ground of convenience on which to found an implied intention in a devisee. When a devise is made to trustees and their heirs, of course they take by force of that gift, unqualified by any subsequent devise, a legal fee. Suppose such devise to be followed by a limitation to the use of A., a person sui juris, for life. Is it doubted that the legal estate for the life of A. shifts out of the trustees into A., or is it doubted that the legal remainder in fee is in the trustees? Suppose the next limitation is to the use of the first and other sons of A. in tail. The legal estate, commensurate in quantity with the estate tail, of course, upon the coming into esse of a tenant in tail, is executed in such tenant in tail, having still the legal remainder in fee in the trustees.

There is no legal difficulty in conceiving a succession of partial legal estates, executed in successive cestuis que use, leaving still the legal fee in remainder in the trustees. What more of legal difficulty is there in substituting the trustees for some of the cestuis que use of partial estates, and holding them to be seised to the use, for example, of A. for life, remainder to the use of themselves for the life of B., a married woman, in trust for B., remainder to the use of C. in tail, and so on? the legal estate of inheritance, subject to the partial interests, whether legal or equitable, carved out of it, remaining in them all the while. The execution of the use does not necessarily require in the cestui que use any beneficial interest; nor is there any legal rule or reasoning that we are aware of, that makes it more improper for a partial estate to be executed in the trustees themselves, either before or after a partial legal estate executed in another cestui que use, being also the beneficiary, than for a succession of partial estates to be executed as legal estates in several successive cestuis que use, being all beneficiaries. The true view of the case is, as we conceive, that, accurately speaking, there would not be, in such a series of limitations as that of Harton v. Harton, (if the legal estate were held not to vest throughout in the trustees), a shifting backwards and forwards of the legal estate, although it has that appearance, and although that mode of expression has been used both in the arguments in Brown v. Whiteway, and in these observations; but that the legal inheritance remains in the trustees, so far and so often as the particular partial estate does not vest as a legal estate; and, therefore, when after a use executed, say for life, the life estate of a married woman arises, it is not that the legal estate, having shifted out of the trustees, shifts back again, but that, the particular legal estate executed in the tenant for life having (speaking of it in point of limitation, and not of time) become exhausted, the legal remainder which never was out of the trustees takes effect, to support the equitable life estate of the married woman.

On the whole, we conclude, that the doctrine of Harton v. Harton is open to much observation; and, as the case of Brown v. Whiteway was decided without any expression of approbation of Harton v. Harton, and solely upon the ground that the court did not think, that, on a demurrer in equity, it ought to overrule a case at law on a purely legal question, the decision in Brown v. Whiteway seems rather to invite, than to repel, criticism on the decision in Harton v. Harton.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE JURIST.

SIR,—What is a sufficient bill of particulars in actions by engineers and surveyors against the projectors of railways or the directors of railway companies, is a question which is frequently arising in practice, but does not seem at present well settled. The only cases in which it has as yet been discussed in court are Higgins v. Ede and Rennie v. Beresford, in the Exchequer, reported in the present volume of THE JURIST, p. 76, Part I. In Higgins v. Ede, the bill of particulars stated the number of miles over which the survey extended, and the branches on which it was made; but did not state how much time was expended on it, or what persons were employed about it, or at what rate per mile the charge was made. A judge at chambers having refused to make an order for better particulars, the court concurred. In Rennie v. Beresford the bill of particulars contained an item of one gross sum for surveying, travelling charges, and assistance, without specifying either the number of days or the number of assistants employed, and without distinguishing how much of the charge was in respect of the plaintiff's own time and labour, and how much for the time and labour of surveyors and levellers found by him. The court refused a rule by which it was sought to compel the plaintiff to reform this item. The Lord Chief Baron, indeed, seems to have intimated his opinion, that the bill of particulars would have been more satisfactory if it had stated how much per mile the plaintiff charged for his survey; but the counsel for the defendant contended, further, that the plaintiff should separate his personal charges as engineer from the other charges.

In a subsequent case, of Galloway v. Bass, Mr. Justice Patteson, at chambers, made an order at variance with the above decisions, after notice of Rennie v. Beresford, and after conferring with the learned Barons on their decision in that case.

The following bill of particulars of the plaintiff's demand had been delivered:—

"To examining the counties of Nottingham, Leicester, Derby, and Warwick, to ascertain the most eligible line for a railway from Nottingham to Coventry; examining the country for various proposed branches to, and deviations from, the main line; making various trials and cross sections; setting out the line, making and directing levels and surveys to be made; making new examination and surveys, in consequence of alterations made from time to time by the suggestions of the consulting engineer; various instructions to Messrs. Dempsey, the surveyors of the company, and general superintendence of plans, sections, and performing all the other duties of civil engineer to the Nottingham, Birmingham, and Coventry Junction Railway. £2000."

A summons was taken out for further and better particulars, which was attended on the 7th February. The application was opposed, on the authority of Rennie v. Beresford. The learned judge took time for the purpose of seeing the learned Barons, and on the 9th made an order for the delivery of "a further and better account in writing of the particulars of plaintiff's demand, for which this action is brought, and stating whether the charge of 2000*l.* is calculated by the day or mile, or how," &c.*

* This case has been communicated by Mr. George Rochfort Clarke, who attended before Mr. Justice Patteson on behalf of the plaintiff, and was also special pleader for the defendant in Rennie v. Beresford.

It may, perhaps, be inferred, from the circumstance of this order having been made after conference with the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, that that court will not adhere to their decision in Rennie v. Beresford and Higgins v. Ede. The opinion, however, of Mr. Justice Patteson is distinctly ascertained, that a bill of particulars in such a case should state how the charge is made.

Yours, faithfully,

G. J. PHILIP SMITH.

ORDER OF COURT.

March 4th, 1846.

Whereas by an act of Parliament made and passed in the session of Parliament held in the eighth and ninth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intitled "An Act to alter and amend an Act passed in the third and fourth Year of the Reign of her present Majesty Queen Victoria, intitled 'An Act to enable the Owners of settled Estates to defray the Expenses of draining the same by way of Mortgage,'" it was, amongst other things, enacted, that, for simplifying the proceedings under the said act, and rendering the same inexpensive, it should be lawful for the Lord High Chancellor, with the assistance of the Master of the Rolls, from time to time to make such orders and provisions as he might think proper for the facilitating the mode of application to the court, and of the proceedings before the Master, or otherwise: And whereas the Right Honourable John Singleton, Lord Lyndhurst, Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, has, with the assistance of the Right Honourable Henry Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, and for the purposes in the said act mentioned, thought proper to make the following orders and provisions. Now, therefore, it is ordered by his Lordship the Lord High Chancellor, with the assistance of his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, that all applications made to this court pursuant to the said act, and all proceedings to be had thereunder, shall be made and conducted in the manner directed by the several orders and provisions hereinafter set forth, viz.

Sheweth,

That the lands hereinafter mentioned, viz. [&c.] are now vested in your petitioner as tenant for life [or otherwise in some other character described in the act], and that your petitioner claims to be entitled to make permanent improvements in the said lands, by such means as are in the said act mentioned, and to cause the expense of making the same to be made a charge on the inheritance of the said lands, under the provisions of the said act.

That the said lands are in the actual occupation of C. D., who hath consented, in writing, to this application.

Your petitioner therefore prays, that your petitioner may be at liberty to make permanent improvements in the said lands, by the means in the said act mentioned, or some of such means, and to cause the expense of making such improvements to be made a charge on the inheritance of the said lands, under the provisions of the said act, or that your Lordship will make such other order in the premises, as to your Lordship shall seem meet.

And your petitioner, &c. (Signed) A. B.

I hereby consent to this petition.

(Signed) C. D., occupying tenant of the lands sought to be improved.

II. The petitioner, in any such petition presented to the Lord Chancellor, is to mark the same at or near the top or upper part thereof with the name of one of the Vice-Chancellors.

III. The Master of the Rolls, in the case of any such petition presented to him, and the Vice-Chancellor with whose name any such petition presented to the Lord Chancellor shall be marked, may, upon consideration of such petition, and without any attendance of counsel, solicitor, or petitioner thereon, if he shall so think fit, make an order on such petition to the effect following, or to such other like effect, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of the case may require.

Form of Order.

Date

In the Matter of &c.

In the Matter of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56, &c.

Upon consideration, &c. of the petition, &c., it is ordered, that it be referred to the Master in rotation to inquire, and state to the court, whether the petitioner is entitled in possession to the lands in the petition mentioned, or any and which of them, within the meaning of the said act of Parliament, and whether the said lands are in the actual occupation of C. D., in the said petition named; and, if so, under what title, and whether the said C. D. has consented, in writing, to the said petition, and to the improvements proposed to be made under the provisions of the said act? And if the Master shall find that the petitioner is so entitled, and that the said C. D. is in such occupation, and has so consented, let the Master further inquire and state to the court what, if any, other persons or person are or is entitled to, or interested in, the said lands, or any of them, in remainder or reversion, or by way of mortgage, charge, or otherwise; and the petitioner is to be at liberty to lay before the Master proposals for making permanent improvements in the said lands, by any such means as are in the said act mentioned, and to set forth in such proposals the nature and extent of such improvements, and the estimated expense thereof, and the estimated value of the permanent improvements proposed to be made. And the Master is to inquire and state whether such proposed improvements are permanent improvements, within the meaning of the said act; and, if so, what will be the expense of making the same, and what will be the value of such permanent improvements? and whether it will be beneficial to all persons interested in the said lands, that such permanent improvements should be made under the provisions of the said act? and the Master is to require such evidence to be produced before him, and, if he shall think proper, is to cause such surveys of the said lands to be made, as shall appear to him to be necessary to enable him to make a satisfactory report on the matters hereby referred to him.

IV. The Master to whom the said reference may be made is to require proof of the deed, will, or other instrument under which the petitioner claims to be entitled to the land, and of the manner in which the petitioner claims title under the same, but he is not otherwise to require proof of the title to the land.

V. The Master, if he shall think it necessary for the due prosecution of the reference, may direct the petitioner to serve any other person, interested in the land, with notice of the proceedings; and such person, so served, may afterwards attend such proceedings as a party thereto; but, if such person, being so served, shall decline or neglect to attend pursuant to such notice, the Master may proceed in his absence, and he is to state the same in his report.

VI. The Master is, during the reference, to be at liberty to apply, by note in writing to the judge by whom the order was made, for any special directions, or for leave to state any special circumstances, touching the matters referred to him; and, if he shall receive any such special directions, or such leave, he is to state the same, and his proceeding thereon, in his report.

VII. The proceedings upon the reference are to be conducted according to the General Rules and Orders of the Court of Chancery, so far as they are consistent with these Orders.

VIII. The Master's report is to be filed in the Report Office.

IX. Any person interested in the land is, within fourteen days after the filing of the report, to be at liberty to petition the Lord Chancellor in case the reference was made by him or any Vice-Chancellor, or the Master of the Rolls in case the reference was made by him, that such report may be reviewed.

X. If such petition shall be presented, the judge by whom the reference was made is to take the same into his consideration; and, if he shall so think fit, he may dispose thereof, either by dismissing the same, or by referring the matter back to the Master with or without special directions.

XI. The judge considering such petition that the Master's report may not be confirmed, may direct any person interested to attend, and may, if he shall think it necessary, but not otherwise, direct the same to be argued by counsel in open court or otherwise.

XII. If a reference back to the Master is made, the proceedings are to be as on the original reference.

XIII. If no petition that the report may be reviewed is presented, the person who has obtained the report may, after the expiration of fourteen days from the filing of the report, present a petition for its confirmation, and for leave to make the proposed improvements under the provisions of the act; and such petition may be in the form hereinafter set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of the case may require.

Form of Petition.

In the Matter of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56, &c.

Whereas — did on the — day of — prefer his petition to the Right Honourable —, thereby setting forth, and praying, that he might be at liberty to make permanent improvements in the lands therein mentioned, under the provisions of the said act; and thereupon his Lordship, on consideration of the matter of the said petition, did, by his order, dated the — day of —, refer it to the Master to make the inquiries therein mentioned; and, in pursuance of the said Order, the said Master has made his report, dated the — day of —, and the said report was duly filed in the Report Office, on the — day of —, and no application has been made that the same may not be confirmed: And the said A. XVII. The Master by whom the report was made may, upon production to him of the order confirming the same and giving leave to make the improvements, deliver to the party who has obtained such order a certificate to the effect and in the form hereinafter stated, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

Form of Certificate.

and

In the Matter of the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56, &c.

Whereas [Recite, 1st, the Order of Reference;

2nd, the Report;

3rd, the Order confirming the report, and authorising the improvements to be made;]

Now, therefore, I the said Master, in pursuance of the said act, do hereby certify, that any person advancing money for making the said permanent improvements specified in my said report will, upon its being made to appear to me that such money, to the amount specified in my said report, has been fully expended in making the said improvements, or in paying the expense of obtaining the authority of this court, become and be entitled to a charge on the inheritance of the land for the repayment of the money advanced, with interest; but such charge is to be subject to the terms and conditions provided by the said act, and before the same can become effective the amount of money expended as aforesaid is to be stated by me by way of endorsement on this certificate.

XVIII. Such certificate is to be made in duplicate, and one copy thereof is to be filed in the Report Office, and the other copy thereof is to be delivered to the party.

XIX. Upon the application of any party to whom such certificate may have been granted, the Master may inquire what sums of money have been bona fide and truly expended in making such permanent improvements in the said land as are mentioned and certified to be proper in his said report, and in defraying such expenses as are in the said act mentioned, and upon what terms as to interest and repayment by instalments the money was advanced; and the Master, having duly inquired into the matter, and being satisfied by proper evidence, may make an endorsement on the said certificate to the effect and in the form hereinafter set forth, with such variations as the nature and circumstances of each case may require.

Form of Indorsement.

Whereas it has been alleged before me that the sum of £—, being the whole [or, "part"] of the sum of £— mentioned in my report recited in the within certificate, has been expended in making such improvements and paying such expenses as are therein mentioned. I have, pursuant to the liberty given to me by the said act, inquired what expenses have been incurred in and about the application to the court, and making the necessary surveys, valuations, and estimates, and also what sums of money have been actually expended in such improvements; and evidence as to such expenses hath been laid before me, and I have duly considered the same; and I do hereby state and certify that it hath been made to appear to me that the sum of £— hath been fully expended in manner aforesaid in such expenses as aforesaid, and the sum of £— for improvements by drainage, warping, irrigation, or embankment, and the sum of £— for improvements by the erection of buildings: And I do hereby further certify that the said several sums amount in the whole to the sum of £—, and that the same was [or, "were"] advanced on &c., [or, "at such several times and in the several sums hereinafter set forth, viz." &c.]; and that such several sums are to be repaid, with interest after the rate of £— per centum per annum, by such equal annual instalments as are hereinafter mentioned, viz. &c.

XX. The indorsement is to be made in duplicate, and one copy thereof is to be written on the party's certificate, and delivered to him; the other is to be filed and annexed to the copy of the certificate filed in the Report Office.

XXI. All orders made by the Master of the Rolls or any Vice-Chancellor are subject to be discharged or varied by the Lord Chancellor on petition to him for that purpose.

CRABE'S LAW of REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 2l. 18s. boards.

THE LAW of REAL PROPERTY in ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABE, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

The success which has attended the system of Assurance pursued by this Company is illustrated by the fact, that at the General Court, held on the 9th day of July last, there was declared a reduction of 25 per cent. on the current year's premiums of all participating policies opened on or before the 9th day of February, 1841.

Thus, a person aged forty, who opened a policy for 1000l. in February, 1841, at an annual premium of £32 10 0

Is called upon to pay this year only 24 7 6

And if this abatement be applied to pay the first year's premium of an additional policy, the party will be further assured to the extent of 215 9 4

LONDON, MARCH 14, 1846.

THE result of some late proceedings at law, has fully satisfied the public, and those unfortunate grown-up children who have for the last year been playing at railway companies, that the creditors of companies that have proceeded just far enough to contract debts for preliminary expenses, and have then sunk into annihilation, may fix upon and carry off their man out of a set of provisional committee-men or preliminary directors, just as a tiger is said to spring from the jungle into the midst of a circle, and to mark and carry off his man; and may obtain payment from their victim alone, if he has had the incaution to hold himself out at all as an active member of the intended company; leaving him to obtain contribution from his fellow committee-men as best he may.

To talk of any hope of a person so dealt with practically obtaining contribution at law would be, of course, out of the question; and those among our professional readers who have attended to equity practice are well aware, that the difficulties besetting any proceeding in equity for that purpose, under the present rules of procedure, even modified and moulded as they have been to the exigences of the times by some late decisions, are nearly insurmountable. So that, in most cases, a person placed in the supposed position, against whom a debt due from the deceased company is recovered, has, practically, no remedy.

It is singular, that, under these circumstances, it has been so little noticed by the Profession, that the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, s. 22, appears to give to the Lord Chancellor and the other equity judges, ample powers to make General Orders for meeting the very case under consideration. By that section, reciting that the law is defective in the means of making the members of joint-stock companies contributaries for paying their debts in full, and in the means of giving relief where execution may have been had in respect of a debt due from any such company against one or a very few members of such company, and also in the means of adjusting the rights of the members of any such company amongst themselves, and, finally, winding up the affairs of such company, it is enacted, "that it shall be lawful for the Lord Chancellor, with the advice and consent of the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors for the time being, or any of them, from time to time, and as often as circumstances shall require, to make and prescribe such rules and Orders touching and concerning the form and mode of proceeding to be had and taken in the Court of Chancery for settling and enforcing the contribution to be paid by any member or members for the time being of any such company, or any former member or members thereof, or any real or personal representative, or other persons liable in that behalf, and the practice to be observed by such court in or relating to such proceeding, or any matters incident thereto, and the form and mode of proceeding to be had and taken before any one of the Masters of the said court, primarily or by reference from the said court, in any measure for or relating to contribution, as shall from time to time seem necessary and proper for the advancement of justice in such cases, and for adjusting and determining the rights and equities of the parties concerned, and for suing for and getting in the assets and for ascertaining and discharging the liabilities of such companies, and requiring the creditors thereof to claim their debts; and, finally, winding up the affairs thereof with as little delay, expense, and uncertainty as possible: Provided always, that such rules and Orders shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament within one month from the making thereof, if Parliament be then sitting, or, if Parliament be not then sitting, within one month from the com-commencement of the then next session of Parliament, and every rule and Order so made shall be binding and obligatory, and be of like force and effect as if the provisions contained therein had been expressly enacted by Parliament."

Some doubt may exist whether the act gives power to make such General Orders in respect of that incomplete species of partnership, composed of persons who meet together as provisional committee-men, and allottees of scrip, and undertake to contribute capital by subscription, for the purpose of doing those things that are necessary to form a complete partnership. We have, in a former paper in this journal, (Vol. 9, p. 489), laboured to prove that such an association, though not a partnership so as to constitute persons members of it ipso facto partners in relation to third persons, is yet a limited partnership of the associated inter se. But, supposing that even, for the purpose of a limited partnership inter se, such persons are partners, it would not follow that they are a "joint-stock company," which is the term used by the section above cited of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111. Assuming, however, that such associations are intended by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, s. 22, that section seems to afford to the Lord Chancellor and the other judges of the courts of equity complete means of meeting the difficulty. Of course it cannot be expected or desired that any General Orders should be framed, which should have the effect of diminishing the right of a creditor to a full remedy. Persons dealing with embryo companies, almost invariably do so on the credit of some particular persons whom they find acting or holding themselves out as members; and it would be grossly unjust to deprive them of their right to recover against such persons; but it may admit of doubt whether there would be any hardship upon persons dealing as creditors, with a body of provisional committee-men on behalf of a numerous body of subscribers, if they were placed by the law in the position of being subjected to the more dilatory process of recovering in equity; not being deprived of their right to recover absolutely against any particular selected members of the company, if the others do not contribute enough; but being compelled in the first instance to seek a remedy against all the members of the company rateably, and, failing in that only, to be entitled to recover the balance against the particular persons selected as principal defendants. This question, however, need not be discussed, as the act gives no power to the court to take away, by General Orders, the right of a creditor to proceed at law; but only to give to the selected debtor, after execution shall have been had against him, the means, which at present he practically has not, of making those contribute to repay him, who are justly bound to do so.

It would be a great boon to the commercial classes, if the learned persons to whom the Legislature has entrusted the power of making General Orders under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, s. 22, should be induced to think it expedient to act upon even the limited powers given to them, and to frame a set of General Orders, with a view to enable the members of such joint-stock companies as we have alluded to, against whom judgment and execution have been obtained, effectively to proceed in equity against their co-members for contribution.

We trust that some influential members of the Bar will take an opportunity of bringing under the notice of the Lord Chancellor, the expediency of directing his attention to the exercise of the powers vested in him by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111. And, in the meantime, in the hope of rousing the attention of the Profession, and of those interested in dying or dead railway companies, to this subject, we shall endeavour in our next Number to collect some suggestions upon the principles which, we apprehend, would be found applicable in respect of the relief required.

ON THE CURTESY OF THE HUSBAND OF A COPARCENER.

The consideration of the subject of descent amongst coparceners naturally leads to the question of curtesy. On the decease of a coparcener of an estate in fee simple, is her husband, having had issue by her, entitled, according to the present law, to an estate for life, by the curtesy of England, in the whole or in any part of her share?

In order to answer this question satisfactorily, it will be necessary, first, to examine into the principles of the ancient law, and then to apply those principles, when ascertained, to the law as at present existing. Unfortunately the authorities whence the principles of the old law ought to be derived do not appear to be quite consistent with one another; and the consequence is, that some uncertainty seems unavoidably to hang over the question above propounded. Let us, however, weigh carefully the opposing authorities, and endeavour to ascertain on which side the scale preponderates.

Littleton, "not the name of the author only, but of the law itself," thus defines curtesy: "Tenant by the curtesie of England is where a man taketh a wife seised in fee simple or in fee tail general, or seised as heir in tail especial, and hath issue by the same wife, male or female, born alive, albeit the issue after dieth or liveth, yet, if the wife dies, the husband shall hold the land during his life by the law of England. And he is called tenant by the curtesie of England, because this is used in no other realme, but in England only." (Litt, s. 35). And, in a subsequent section, he adds, "Memorandum, that, in every case where a man taketh a wife seised of such an estate of tenements, &c., as the issue which he hath by his wife may, by possibility, inherit the same tenements of such an estate as the wife hath, as heir to the wife; in this case, after the decease of the wife, he shall have the same tenements by the curtesie of England, but otherwise not." (Litt, s. 52). "Memorandum," says Lord Coke, in his Commentary, (Co. Litt. 40. a.), "this word doth ever betoken some excellent point of learning." Again, "As heir to the wife. This doth imply a secret of law, for, except the wife be actually seised, the heir shall not (as hath been said) make himself heir to the wife; and this is the reason, that a man shall not be tenant by the curtesie of a seisin in law." Here, we find it asserted by Littleton, that the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy, unless he has had issue by his wife capable of inheriting the land as her heir; and this is explained by Lord Coke to be, such issue as would have traced their descent from the wife, as the stock of descent, according to the maxim, "Seisina facit stipitem." Unless an actual seisin had been obtained by the wife, she could not have been the stock of descent; for the descent of a fee simple was traced from the person last actually seised; "and this is the reason," says Lord Coke, "that a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a mere seisin in law." The same rule, with the same reason for it, will also be found in Paine's case, (8 Rep. 36 a), where it is said, "And when Littleton saith, as heir to the wife, these words are very material; for that is the true reason that a man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a seisin in law, for, in such case, the issue ought to make himself heir to him who was last actually seised." The same doctrine again appears in Blackstone, (2 Black. Comm. 128): "And this seems to be the principal reason why the husband cannot be tenant by the curtesy of any lands of which the wife was not actually seised; because, in order to entitle himself to such estate, he must have begotten issue that may be heir to the wife; but no one, by the standing rule of law, can be heir to the ancestor of any land, whereof the ancestor was not actually seised; and, therefore, as the husband hath never begotten any issue that can be heir to those lands, he shall not be tenant of them by the curtesy. And hence," continues Blackstone, in his usual laudatory strain, "we may observe, with how much nicety and consideration the old rules of law were framed, and how closely they are connected and interwoven together, supporting, illustrating, and demonstrating one another." Here we have, indeed, a formidable array of authorities, all to the point, that, in order to entitle the husband to his curtesy, his wife must have been the stock from whom descent should have been traced to her issue; for the principal and true reason that there could not be any curtesy of a seisin in law is stated to be, that the issue could not, in such a case, make himself heir to the wife, because his descent was then required to be traced from the person last actually seised.

Let us, then, endeavour to apply this principle to the present law. The act for the amendment of the law of inheritance (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106) enacts, (sect. 2), that, in every case, descent shall be traced from the purchaser. On the decease of a coparcener, the descent of her share is, therefore, to be now traced, not from herself, but from her ancestor, the purchaser, from whom she inherited. With respect to the persons to become entitled, as heir to the purchaser on this descent, the question arises, which has already been discussed, (ante, p. 71), whether the surviving sister equally with the issue of the deceased, or whether such issue solely, are now entitled to inherit? And the conclusion at which we arrived was, that the issue solely succeeded to their mother's share. But, whether this be so, or not, nothing is clearer than that, on the decease of a coparcener, the persons who next inherit take as heir to the purchaser, and not to the coparcener; for, from the purchaser alone can descent be now traced; and the mere circumstance of having obtained an actual seisin does not now make the parcener the stock of descent. How, then, can her husband be entitled to hold her share as tenant by the curtesy? If tenancy by the curtesy was allowed of those lands only of which the wife had obtained actual seisin, because it was a necessary condition of curtesy that the wife should be the stock of descent, and because an actual seisin alone made the wife the stock of descent, how can the husband obtain his curtesy in any case where the stock of descent is confessedly not the wife, but the wife's ancestor? Amongst all the recent alterations of the law, the doctrine of curtesy has been left untouched; there seems, therefore, to be no means of determining any question respecting it, but by applying the old principles to the new enactments, by which, indirectly, it may be affected. So far, then, as at present appears, it seems a fair and proper deduction from the authorities, that, whenever a woman has become entitled to lands by descent, her husband cannot claim his curtesy, because the descent of such lands, on her decease, is not to be traced from her.

But, by carrying our investigations a little further, we may be disposed to doubt, if not to deny, that such is the law; not that the conclusion drawn is unwarranted by the authorities, but the authorities themselves may, perhaps, be found to be erroneous. Let us now compare the law of curtesy of an estate tail with the law of curtesy of an estate in fee simple. In the section of Littleton which we have already quoted, (sect. 35), it is laid down, that, if a man taketh a wife seised as heir in tail especial, and hath issue by her, born alive, he shall, on her decease, be tenant by the curtesy. And on this Lord Coke makes, the following commentary:—"And here Littleton intendeth a seisin in deed, if it may be attained unto. As if a man dieth seised of lands in fee simple or fee tail general, and these lands descend to his daughter, and she taketh a husband and hath issue, and dyeth before any entry, the husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy, and yet, in this case, she had a seisin in law; but, if she or her husband had, during her life, entered, he should have been tenant by the curtesy." (Co. Litt. 29. a.) Now, it is well known that the descent of an estate tail is always traced from the purchaser or original donee in tail. The actual seisin which might be obtained by the heir to an estate tail never made him the stock of descent. The maxim was, "Possessio fratris de feudo simplici facit sororem esse heredem." Where, therefore, a coparcener who had been seised in tail died, leaving issue, such issue made themselves heir not to her, but to her ancestor, the purchaser or donee; and whether the mother did or did not obtain actual seisin was, in this respect, totally immaterial. When actual seisin was obtained, the issue still made themselves heir to the purchaser only, and yet the husband was entitled to his curtesy. When actual seisin was not obtained, the issue were heirs to the purchaser as before; but the husband lost his curtesy. In the case of an estate tail, therefore, it is quite clear that the question of curtesy or no curtesy depended entirely on the husband's obtaining for his wife an actual seisin, and had nothing to do with the circumstance of the wife's being, or not being, the stock of descent. The reason, therefore, before mentioned, given by Lord Coke and repeated by Blackstone, cannot apply to an estate tail. An actual seisin could not have been required in order to make the wife the stock of descent, because the descent could not, under any circumstances, be traced from her, but must have been traced from the original donee to the heir of his body per formam doni.

Again, if we look to the law respecting curtesy in incorporeal hereditaments, we shall find that the reason above given is inapplicable; for the husband, on having issue born, was entitled to his curtesy out of an advowson and a rent, although no actual seisin had been obtained, in the wife's lifetime, by receipt of the rent or presentation to the advowson, (Watk. Descents, 39, 47, 4th ed.) And yet, in order to make the wife the stock of descent as to such hereditaments, it was necessary that an actual seisin should be obtained by her. (Watk. Descents, 60, 67, 4th ed.) The husband, therefore, was entitled to his curtesy where the descent to the issue was traced from the ancestor of his wife, as well as where traced from the wife herself. In this case, also, the right to curtesy was, accordingly, independent of the wife's being, or not being, the stock from which the descent was to be traced.

We are driven, therefore, to search for another and more satisfactory reason why an actual seisin should have been required to be obtained by the wife, in order to entitle her husband to his curtesy out of her lands; and such a reason is furnished by Lord Coke himself, and also by Blackstone. Lord Coke says, (Co. Litt. 31. a.), "Where lands or tenements descend to the husband, before entry he hath but a seisin in law, and yet the wife shall be endowed, albeit it be not reduced to an actual possession, for it lieth not in the power of the wife to bring it to an actual seisin, as the husband may do of his wife's land, when he is to be tenant by curtesy, which is worthy the observation." It would seem from this, therefore, that the reason why an actual seisin was required to entitle the husband to his curtesy was, that his wife might not suffer by his neglect to take possession of her lands; and, in order to induce him to do so, the law allowed him curtesy of all lands of which an actual seisin had been obtained, but refused him his curtesy out of such lands as he had taken no pains to obtain possession of. This reason also is adopted by Blackstone from Coke: "A seisin in law of the husband will be as effectual as a seisin in deed, in order to render the wife dowable; for it is not in the wife's power to bring the husband's title to an actual seisin, as it is in the husband's power to do with regard to the wife's lands: which is one reason why he shall not be tennant by the curtesy, but of such lands whereof the wife, or he himself in her right, was actually seised in deed." (2 Black. Com. 131). The more we investigate the rules and principles of the ancient law, the greater will appear the probability that this reason was indeed the true one. In the troublous times of old, an actual seisin was not always easily acquired. The doctrine of continual claim shews that peril was not unfrequently incurred in entering on lands for the sake of asserting a title; for, in order to obtain an actual seisin, any person entitled, if unable to approach the premises, was bound to come as near as he dare. (Litt., m. 419, 421). And "it is to be observed," says Lord Coke, "that every doubt or fear is not sufficient, for it must concern the safety of the person of a man, and not his houses or goods; for if he fear the burning of his houses, or the taking away or spoiling of his goods, this is not sufficient." (Co. Litt. 253. b.) That actual seisin should be obtained was obviously most desirable, and nothing could be more natural or reasonable than that the husband should have no curtesy where he had failed to obtain it. Perkins seems to think that this was the reason of the rule; for in his Profitable Book he answers an objection to it, founded on an extreme case. "But if possession in law of lands or tenements in fee descend unto a married woman, which lands are in the county of York, and the husband and his wife are dwelling in the county of Essex, and the wife dieth within one day after the descent, so as the husband could not enter during the coverture, for the shortness of the time, yet he shall not be tenant by the curtesy, &c.; and yet, according to common pretence, there is no default in the husband. But it may be said that the husband of the woman, before the death of the ancestor of the woman, might have spoken unto a man dwelling near unto the place where the lands lay, to enter for the woman, as in her right, immediately after the death of her ancestor," &c. (Perk. 470). This reason for the rule is also quite consistent with the circumstance that the husband was entitled to his curtesy out of incorporeal hereditaments, notwithstanding his failure to obtain an actual seisin. For if the advowson were not void, or the rent did not become payable during the wife's life, it was obviously impossible for the husband to present to the one or receive the other; and it would have been unreasonable that he should suffer for not doing an impossibility, the maxim being, "Impotentia excusat legem." This is the reason, indeed, usually given to explain this circumstance; and it will be found both in Lord Coke (Co. Litt. 29. a.) and Blackstone, (2 Black. Com. 127). This reason, however, is plainly at variance with that mentioned in the former part of this paper, and adduced by them to explain the necessity of an actual seisin, in order to entitle the husband to his curtesy out of lands in fee simple.

There still remains, however, the section of Littleton to which we have before referred, (sect. 52), as an apparent authority on the other side. Littleton expressly says, that when the issue may, by possibility, inherit of such an estate as the wife hath, as heir to the wife, the husband shall have his curtesy, but otherwise not; and we have seen that, according to Lord Coke's interpretation, to inherit as heir to the wife, means, here, to inherit from the wife as the stock of descent. But the legitimate mode of interpreting an author certainly is to attend to the context, and to notice in what sense he himself uses the phrase in question on other occasions. If now we turn to the very next section of Littleton, we shall find the very same phrase made use of in a manner which clearly shews that Littleton did not mean, by inheriting as heir to a person, inheriting from that person as the stock of descent. For, after having thus laid down the law as to curtesy, Littleton continues: "And, also, in every case where a woman taketh a husband seised of such an estate in tenements, &c., so as, by possibility, it may happen that the wife may have issue by her husband, and that the same issue may, by possibility, inherit the same tenements of such an estate as the husband hath, as heir to the husband, of such tenements she shall have her dower, and otherwise not." (Litt., s. 53). Now, nothing is clearer than that a wife was entitled to dower out of lands of which her husband had only a seisin in law; (Watk. Descents, 32, 42, 4th ed.); and nothing, also, is clearer than that a seisin in law only was insufficient to make the husband the stock of descent; for, for this purpose, an actual seisin was requisite, according to the rule, "Seisina facit stipitem." In this case, therefore, it is obvious that Littleton could not mean to say that the husband must have been made the stock of descent, by virtue of having obtained an actual seisin; for that would have been to contradict the plainest rules of law. What, then, was his meaning? The subsequent part of the same section affords an explanation: "For, if tenements be given to a man and to the heirs which he shall beget of the body of his wife, in this case the wife hath nothing in the tenements, and the husband hath an estate tail as donee in special tail. Yet, if the husband die without issue, the same wife shall be endowed of the same tenements, because the issue which she, by possibility, might have had by the same husband, might have inherited the same tenements. But, if the wife dieth living her husband, and after the husband takes another wife and dieth, his second wife shall not be endowed in this case, for the reason aforesaid." This example shews what was Littleton's true meaning. He was not thinking, either in this section or in the one next before it, of the husband or wife being the stock of descent, instead of some earlier ancestor. He was laying down a general rule, applicable to dower as well as to curtesy; namely, that, if the issue that might have been born in the one case, or that were born in the other, of the surviving parent, could not, by possibility, inherit the estate of their deceased parent, by right of representation of such parent, then the surviving parent was not entitled to dower in the one case, or to curtesy in the other. It is plain, that, in the example just adduced, the issue of the husband by his second marriage could not possibly inherit his estate, which was given to him and the heirs of his body by his first wife: the second wife, therefore, was excluded from dower out of this estate. And, in the parallel case of a gift to a woman and the heirs of her body by her first husband, it is indisputable, that, for a precisely similar reason, her second husband could not claim his curtesy on having issue by her; for such issue could not possibly inherit their mother's estate. All that Littleton then intended to state with respect to curtesy was the rule laid down by the Statute de Donis, (13 Edw. 1. c. 1), which provides, that, where any person gives lands to a man and his wife and the heirs of their bodies, or where any person gives lands in frankmarriage, the second husband of any such woman shall not have anything in the land so given, after the death of his wife, by the law of England, nor shall the issue of the second husband and wife succeed in the inheritance. (See Bac. Abr., tit. "Curtesy of England," (C.), 1). When the two sections of Littleton are read consecutively, without the introduction of Lord Coke's Commentary, their meaning is apparent; and the intervening commentary not only puts the reader on the wrong clue, but hinders his recovery of the right one, by removing to a distance the explanatory context.

If our construction of Littleton be the true one, it throws some light on the question discussed in our last paper, on the course of descent amongst coparceners. We there endeavoured to shew that the issue of a coparcener always stood in the place of their parent, by right of representation, even where descent was traced from some more remote ancestor as the stock. Littleton, with this view of the subject in his mind, and never suspecting that any other could be entertained, might well speak generally of issue inheriting as heir to their parent, even though the share of the parent might have descended to the issue as heir to some more remote ancestor. The authorities adduced in our former paper thus tend further to explain the language of Littleton; whilst the language of Littleton, as above explained, illustrates and confirms the authorities previously adduced.

Having, at length, arrived at the true principles of the old law, the application of them to the state of circumstances produced by the new law of inheritance will be very easy. A coparcener dies leaving a husband who has had issue by her, and leaving one or more sisters surviving her. The descent of her share is now traced from their common parent, the purchaser. But, in tracing this descent, we have seen, in our former paper, that the issue of the deceased coparcener would inherit her entire share by representation of her. And the condition which will entitle her husband to curtesy out of her share appears, by our present paper, to be, that his issue might possibly inherit the estate by right of representation of their deceased mother. This condition, therefore, is obviously fulfilled, and our conclusion consequently is, that the husband of a deceased coparcener who has had issue by her is entitled to curtesy out of the whole of her share. But, in order to arrive at this conclusion, it seems that we must admit, first, that Lord Coke has endeavoured to support the law by one reason too many; and, secondly, that one laudatory flourish of Blackstone has been made without occasion.

LONDON, MARCH 21, 1846.

If ever there was an unfortunate set of acts of Parliament, it is that by which the session of the 8 & 9 Vict. signalled itself as a law-reforming session. Some of those acts are undoubtedly total failures. No one, for instance, dreams of paying the slightest attention to chapters 119 and 129, with their equivalent columns, and formulæ of impossible application. But the 112th chapter, the act for rendering the assignment of satisfied terms unnecessary, which really is a beneficial act, and is effectively drawn, always allowing for the somewhat crotchety and inconsistent language by which a term is destroyed and yet kept alive,—even that act is subjected to attacks of all kinds, and for all reasons, some of which are reasonable and some not.

We have now before us a paper, in which it is argued, that the Assignment of Terms Act has failed altogether to effect its purpose, and leaves the expense attending titles arising out of the existence of attendant terms just what it was. The difficulty suggested is this: that if A., having purchased land, and having had an outstanding term assigned to a trustee (B.) in the usual manner before the 1st January, 1846, requires to bring an ejectment, and B., the trustee, has died since, making his executor, A. must bring the ejectment in the name of the executor of B., if at all. And then it is said that the purpose of the act will be totally frustrated, because, as to these terms, it will be the duty of every conveyancer, in advising on a title, to insist that the term shall be traced down to the person who would have been actually entitled to the term supposing it still to subsist, and, moreover, that such person shall be producible; otherwise the term will, it is said, be useless for the purpose of protection. Thus, it is argued, parties will be put to the same expense and inconvenience as formerly, because the expense and inconvenience were occasioned by tracing out the title to the term and finding the holder, the expense of assignment being a mere trifle.

Now, this objection, we confess, appears to us a very unfair one. No one can reasonably complain, that, if he wants the particular protection of an outstanding term, he should take the trouble to procure it. If the owner of land, who took an assignment of a term to a trustee before the 1st January, 1846, thinks the trouble of deducing the title in the term down to the person in whom it is vested too great, he easily avoids that trouble, simply by dispensing with the protection of the term. The act does not force it upon him, but merely offers it to him. It was no part of the intention of the act to give him a title without his shewing a title, or to put him in a better situation than if the act had not passed. All that the act obviously intends, is to abolish attendant terms in future—to prevent their being perpetuated, but, at the same time, to avoid the injustice of depriving a purchaser, who had already got a term assigned to his trustee, of the benefit of it, by putting him in the same position as regards the protection to be derived from his term, as if the act had not passed. If the act had never passed, a purchaser must always have shewn in whom the term was vested, before he could bring ejectment upon it; and so he must now; and where is the hardship, or the failure of justice?

But, more than this, it would, we contend, be grossly unjust to absolve a claimant to the benefit of the term, from the necessity of tracing the title to it from his original trustee; for that would take for granted that no alienation by such original trustee, lawful or unlawful, had taken place between the assignment to him and the 1st January, 1846; and the result might be to enable a person to recover under colour of a term to which he had no title, as it might by possibility be actually vested in a trustee, in trust for a purchaser for valuable consideration. It is now, of course, or ought to be, the practice, for a purchaser, whenever there is a term attendant upon the inheritance, to inquire of the last apparent assignee whether he has aliened or encumbered. If a purchaser does that, he will acquire priority, we apprehend, against any one not having an actual assignment of the term: but neither that nor anything else can or ought to protect him against the title of an actual assignee of the term having an equal equity; and it would be too much, to expect that the act should destroy the legal rights, quantum valeant, of any claimant to the benefit of a term, in order to save a purchaser the trouble of deducing his title.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE 7 & 8 VICT. CAP. 111, PARTICULARLY WITH REFERENCE TO THE 22ND SECTION.

Upon looking at the 22nd section of this statute, two questions immediately suggest themselves. The first is, that which we very slightly noticed in the last Number of THE JURIST, whether the statute applies to associations of persons composed of provisional committee-men or directors, and either actual allottees of shares, or persons having bound themselves by their applications for shares; and, secondly, if it does, then to what extent does the act give power substantially to vary the rights of parties, under orders purporting only to regulate forms of proceeding. On the first point, the difficulty arises from the use, in the 22nd section, of the word "joint-stock company." It is only with reference to bodies that are joint-stock companies within the meaning of the act, that the powers conferred by the 22nd section have any existence. The act itself does not give any specific definition of what shall constitute a joint-stock company. It appears to have two distinct objects: the first, to which all the sections except the 22nd apply, is to prescribe certain modes of proceeding for winding up the affairs of such companies as are described in the act, upon their committing such acts as are made by the statute acts of bankruptcy by the company*. The second, (sect. 22), and this seems to be wholly severed from the first object, is to provide means, with or without winding up the affairs of the company, for compelling the members to contribute towards recouping any one against whom execution shall have been had, upon judgment recovered in an action brought against that one alone.

* It may here be observed, that, on the 17th instant, the first order was made under this act, by Mr. Commissioner Fonblanque, for bringing before the Master of the Rolls the winding up of a bankrupt joint-stock company. The order is as follows:—"In the Matter of the Forth Marine Insurance Company, bankrupt.—By virtue of the authority given to this court by an act passed in the seventh and eighth years of the reign of her present Majesty, intitled, 'An Act for facilitating the winding up the Affairs of Joint-stock Companies unable to meet their present Engagements,' this court doth order and direct, that William Cook and Lewis Mackinnon, the creditors' assignees of the estate and effects of the above-named company, bankrupt, do forthwith apply to the high Court of Chancery, by petition, in a summary way, to the Master of the Rolls, praying that all such orders and directions may be given as shall be necessary for the final winding-up and settling the affairs of the said company, and to compel a just contribution from all the members of the said company, towards the full payment of all the debts and liabilities of the said company, and of the costs of winding up and finally settling the affairs of such company."

The constitution of the companies to which the bankruptcy clauses apply are sufficiently described in the first clause.

- I. Commercial or trading companies, incorporated by charter, or by act of Parliament, after the passing of the act.
- II. Companies for commercial or trading purposes subsisting under the 1 Vict. c. 73, or any other act of Parliament.
- III. Commercial or trading companies, or bodies registered either provisionally or completely under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.
- IV. Any existing joint-stock companies comprehended within the definition of a joint-stock company given by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110.

These are the four classes of commercial associations to which the bankruptcy clauses of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, apply.

Now, if we look to the interpretation clause of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, we find that it includes in its definition of a joint-stock company "every partnership whereof the capital is divided, or agreed to be divided, into shares, and so as to be transferable, without the express consent of all the co-partners," and "every co-partnership which, at its formation, or by subsequent admission, (except any admission subsequent on devolution or other act in law), shall consist of more than twenty-five members."

The last of these definitions, supposing we are to construe the 22nd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, by reference to the first, and thence by reference to the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, would undoubtedly include most embryo railway companies, composed of provisional committee-men and persons having taken or being bound to take shares, provided it can be assumed that such associations are partnerships. But that is the very point which is at present much doubted, we believe, in the Profession; and most certainly such associations are not partnerships in the general and unlimited legal sense of the word. (Fox v. Clifton, 4 M. & P. 676; Pitchford v. Davis, 7 Mee. & W. 2).

But, assuming for the present that the 22nd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, is a separate enactment, not to be construed by reference to the clauses which relate to bankrupt companies, we have then to inquire, in endeavouring to form an opinion as to what associations the court would hold within the meaning of that section, what is a joint-stock company without reference to the 110th or 111th chapter of the 7 & 8 Vict.; what is, in fact, in common legal acceptance, a joint-stock company. Now, in one sense, no doubt, every common partnership is a joint-stock company, inasmuch as every partnership trades upon the joint stock of the whole partnership. But no one certainly would, in common parlance, describe an ordinary banking or other partnership as a joint-stock company. And if there be any peculiar legal force in the term, it is to be sought in the Bubble Act, (6 Geo. 1), which was passed in reference to the earliest joint-stock companies.

According to that act, and according to general understanding, a joint-stock company is a partnership in which the partners not only contribute each his separate part of the joint stock, but make, or affect to make, their shares transferable without the assent of the other partners, and are, or affect to be, liable only to the extent of their shares. A joint-stock company in this view is a complete partnership, in which each partner contributes his share of the partnership stock, and is, or affects to be, responsible only to that extent.

The hypothesis of the existence of such an association in the present known state of the law, seems to require at least a complete, ly organised partnership, acting under a deed of settlement, and possessing all the attributes of a complete legal company, except the possession of the legal rights conferred by charter or by act of Parliament. And can it be said to be clear, that an association of individuals never incorporated by act of Parliament or by charter, not even, perhaps, bound by any deed of settlement, but bound only by those implied ties of partnership which depend on their having acted together and incurred liabilities which, as to third persons, are not merely joint, and are only impliedly joint as between themselves? can it be said that such shapeless, semi-organised associations are "joint-stock companies," in the sense in which the term is used in the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, 111, or in any legal sense? We apprehend, not; and, therefore, we conclude, that it is, at least, so doubtful whether the stat. 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, s. 22, is intended to apply to an association other than completely formed joint-stock companies, that the validity of any general orders purporting to be made in pursuance of that section might be contested, if an attempt was made to apply them to the semi-organised associations composed merely of provisional committee-men and allottees of, or contractors for, shares, whose members are at present occupying so large a share of public attention.

If we are right in this construction of the 22nd section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, it is unnecessary to consider whether that section is so far connected with the general object of the act, as to be inapplicable except in the case of bankruptcy of a company.

It is quite clear, however, that the mischief attending the state of these half-formed companies is of the very gravest character; and that, if the Court of Chancery has no power of meeting the mischief under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 111, or otherwise, the interference of the Legislature is imperatively called for; and the next question that we shall here venture to consider, is, what are the principles on which a legislative remedy should be founded? Now, the great difficulty of proceeding, at present, in equity*, to obtain contribution against persons co-liaible with the plaintiff, depends upon the necessity of making all the persons liable parties, whence result all the inconveniences of a suit practically unmanageable, not only on account of the extraordinary expense and delay, but on account of the great chance of continually occurring abatement. This difficulty is severely felt even when there are comparatively few parties, but when the parties are some tens, or, perhaps, some hundreds, a suit becomes utterly unmanageable.

Now, the expense and delay seems principally to result from the form of the ordinary proceeding by bill and answer, and the impracticability of bringing a contribution suit to a successful hearing when there are many parties, from the doctrine of abatement. The remedy, therefore, seems to be of a twofold character, and to consist in the substitution of some more brief and summary mode of presenting the case to the court than by bill and answer; and in the abolition, for this class of cases, of the doctrine, that the proceeding dies because an individual party to it has thought fit to die. What we should suggest, as the outline of a remedial measure, were it cast upon us to do so, would be this:—

That, in any case of an association, either being a complete partnership, or a preliminary association formed and acting in contemplation of a complete partnership, any member thereof against whom proceedings at law shall have been taken or threatened, to recover any debts due from the whole association, or from several members of it, shall be at liberty to present a petition, ex parte, to the Court of Chancery, (supported, of course, by prima facie evidence), stating the case, and setting forth, in a schedule, a list of the persons alleged to be liable to contribution. That thereupon the court shall refer it to the Master to inquire into the matters alleged by the petition. That the Master shall have power, and be bound, to issue a peremptory order, on the application of the petitioner, to be personally served upon each of the persons named in the schedule to the petition, returnable within some given (and not very long) time after service, requiring such person to appear and shew cause before the Master, why he should not be compelled to contribute his proportionate part of the demand made, or threatened to be made, on the petitioner. That persons appearing on the order shall be heard by themselves, or their agents or counsel, as they may think fit, upon evidence by affidavit, or viva voce, as the Master shall direct; the costs of the appearance of each party to be in the discretion of the Master, subject, of course, to the revision of the court. This would be quite necessary, to prevent the vexatious summoning of persons as parties, without sufficient ground for making against them even a prima facie case of liability.

That any person neglecting to appear and shew cause within the given time (and not shewing good reason for enlarging the time for his being permitted to be heard) shall be held to admit his liability to contribute in the proportion found by the Master. That the Master shall make his report, subject to exceptions, like any other report, and that, the report being confirmed, the court shall thereupon have power to make a peremptory order, having the force of a judgment at law, on which execution as upon a judgment may be had against the persons directed by the order to contribute, in cases where judgment has been recovered and execution had against the petitioner. But, if the petition is presented in consequence only of the threat of an action, then, upon the report being confirmed, instead of an order on the contributaries to pay, an order as of course should be obtainable by the petitioner, directing each person found liable to pay the sum that he is so found liable to contribute, into the Accountant-General's, to the credit of the matter of the petition; and then, upon an action being brought against the original petitioner, or any other of the persons found liable, the court should have power, upon motion by the defendant at law, (on notice), to stay the action, and require the plaintiff at law to make out his claim before the Master; and, upon his substantiating his claim, to order him payment and costs primarily out of the fund in court, and if that proved to be insufficient, then payment of the remainder by the defendant at law.

In case it should happen (and, probably, if such a course of proceeding were established, it most frequently would happen) that the creditor, knowing a fund to be in court, should prefer applying for payment directly to the Court of Chancery, he should have power so to do, by petition, to be served on any such person as he might have a right to select as defendant at law; and thereupon the court might decide at once, if the nature of the proof permitted it, or might refer it to the Master; and the creditor, having proved, should be paid his debt and costs out of the fund.

Such appears to us the rough outline of a mode of proceeding which might practically work, so as to protect the members of either complete or incomplete companies, against the disposition of their partners to evade contribution, and, at the same time, not interfere with the rights of the creditor to recover his debt.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed the following gentlemen Masters Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery:—John Knapp, of Worcester; Robert Townsend Hippisley, of Chewton Mendip and Midsomer Norton, Somersetshire.

* We speak only of proceedings in equity, taking it to be clear that to recover contribution by actions at law is wholly impracticable.

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 61. 10s. in strong cloth bds., BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE and PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Exeter District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of those Statutes the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The Title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superceding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fullness of the Marginal Notes.

CRABE'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 2l. 18s. boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABE, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is mere matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to shew the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an immoderate size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts.

LONDON, MARCH 28, 1846.

A very important case for solicitors has lately been determined by the Master of the Rolls, (Stanes v. Parker, not yet reported). The defendant, Charles George Parker, a solicitor, was a trustee of certain property under the will of one William Clachar, and the plaintiffs were the cestuis que trustent. The defendant had done certain law business for the plaintiffs, in reference to the sale of the trust estate, and had delivered to them a bill of costs, and a draft of a release to himself as trustee, duly accounting for the trust property, after deducting the amount of his bill. The draft release was kept by the plaintiffs for a fortnight, and then they executed the deed. They afterwards filed their bill, in effect to set aside the release, and to have their shares of the testator's estate paid to them, without allowing the defendant any payments for his professional services in the matter of the trust. The charges were not objected to as such. The only objection was, that the defendant, being a trustee, had no right to charge for services done as solicitor to the trust. Lord Langdale dismissed the bill, with costs, observing that, the plaintiffs having had the draft release before them from the 27th October to the 13th November, and having executed it, with full means of information, he saw no grounds for not giving the release its full operation.

The general and well-settled rule undoubtedly is, that, if a solicitor, being a trustee, thinks fit to transact professional business in relation to the trust, he is not entitled to any remuneration for his services*. The rule is, however, merely that he cannot, in the absence of express agreement, insist upon payment; not that it is impossible for him to put himself in a position to be entitled to payment, or that in no case, even in the absence of express agreement, can a valid payment be made to him.

If, by express contract with the intended cestuis que trustent, being sui juris, before accepting the trust, and without any fraud or undue pressure, a solicitor stipulates that he shall be paid for professional services, it seems that such a contract would be good. In Moore v. Frowd, (3 My. & C. 45), which turned upon whether the language of a trust deed authorised the payment to a trustee, being a solicitor, of his professional charges, Lord Cottenham said, "The first question is, whether the deed of trust disposes of this question, because the parties may, by contract, make a rule for themselves, and agree that a trustee, being a solicitor, shall have some benefit beyond that which, without such contract, the law would have allowed; but, in such a case, the agreement must be distinct, and in its terms explain to the client the effect of the arrangement; and the more particularly, when the solicitor for the client, becoming himself a trustee, has an interest, personal to himself, adverse to that of the client. It is not easy, in such a case, to conceive how, consistently with the established rules respecting contracts between solicitors and their clients, a solicitor could maintain such a contract, made with his client, for his own benefit, the client having no other professional adviser, and in the absence of all evidence, and of any probability, of the client (a woman, too) having been aware of her rights, or of the rule of law, or of the effect of the contract; but the necessity for following up these considerations does not arise in this case, unless the deed contains a distinct agreement for this purpose."

The qualifications, with which Lord Cottenham has guarded even the doctrine, that, by agreement antecedent to the acceptance of the trust, a solicitor may stipulate that he shall be paid for professional services, render it a contract, the enforcing of which is by no means to be reckoned upon as free from difficulty; and it is obvious, that, in acting upon such contracts, much must be trusted by either party to the good faith of the other.

Whether a solicitor, who has accepted a trust without any stipulation antecedent to and as a condition of his acceptance, can by subsequent stipulation put himself in a position to be enabled to recover payment of his charges for professional business done in the matter of the trust, is a question of much more difficulty. We are not aware of any authority expressly deciding the point; and, upon principle, it should seem that such a contract ought not to be made. Because, firstly, in acting for the trust estate, the trustee is, technically speaking, acting for himself—employing himself. His contract, therefore, with the cestuis que trustent is technically a nullity. For, as he is the owner of the trust estate, he alone has authority to employ a solicitor in the trust business; and a contract with the cestuis que trustent that he shall employ himself is a contract without a consideration. They have no power to prevent his employing whom he may think fit; no authority to select any solicitor; and nothing, therefore, to contract about. Secondly, in regard to the policy of the matter; the mischief which the policy of the law apprehends from a trustee being allowed, in the absence of contract, to charge for business done by himself, would be equally to be apprehended if a trustee might contract with his cestuis que trustent to be paid for his services. Because, the relation of trustee gives him an advantage in dealing with the cestui que trust, which would make it necessary in every case to inquire whether the acquiescence of the cestui que trust in the contract, was not the result of undue pressure or influence.

It is, however, quite another thing to say, that, if the cestui que trust, not being liable to pay his trustee for his professional services, thinks fit to do so, after due time and opportunity for exercising his judgment, such a payment shall be at all, or after any lapse of time, revocable. The policy of such a rule as that might be very questionable, as many cases may occur in which the services of a particular person as trustee are desired, specifically because it may be the interest or the choice of the cestui que trust, that his trustee and solicitor should be one and the same person. And, if the solicitor is dependant for his payment upon the good faith of his client, it is impossible to say that the disadvantage of that position, is not fully a counter-balance for any advantage or influence which his position as trustee may give him.

Lord Langdale's judgment in Stanes v. Parker seems, however, to settle the question to this extent: that, if cestuis que trustent, having had before them for a reasonable time their trustee's bill of costs, and the instrument by which he proposes that they should release him from the trusts, think fit to pay that bill, and, by their own deliberate and solemn deed, to ratify the payment, they shall not afterwards re-open the transaction merely on the ground of the solicitor having been also trustee. We have not been informed whether it appeared in Stanes v. Parker that the defendant had distinctly apprised the plaintiffs of their right to refuse payment of his bill, or whether their knowledge of their right was presumed. We conceive, however, that, in acting upon the authority of Stanes v. Parker, it will always be a prudent as well as a proper course for the trustee, specifically to apprise the cestuis que trustent of their legal right to refuse payment.

THE LIABILITIES OF ALLOTTEES OF RAILWAY SCRIP.

It has been well observed, in a leading daily journal, that the subject of the liability of allottees to an action at law, for the amount of their deposits, is the most interesting, with the exception of the legality of the sale of scrip, of all the numerous questions connected with railways. In considering a question of this sort, arising under circumstances, which, as a system, are absolutely the creation of the present day, it is material to look at the morality and justice of the case; because the law is not settled, and because it may well be anticipated, that, in deciding what is the law, regard will be had to those implied intentions of parties, to which one of the keys is the obvious justice or injustice of particular implied intentions.

The only actual decision at law which bears materially upon the question whether allottees of shares in railway companies, resting only in project, are liable to pay their deposits towards defraying the preliminary expenses, is Noctels v. Crosby, (3 B. & C. 822), decided long before the great railway company mania. In that case, the doctrine laid down is well represented in the language of Bayley, J.: "In all projects some expense must be incurred before many members join the concern. Upon whom should that fall? Undoubtedly, if the scheme proves abortive, it should fall upon the original projectors, and not upon those who advance their money upon the faith of its going on." And Littleale, J., said, "If persons set a scheme on foot and assume to be directors or managers, all the expenses incurred before the scheme is in actual operation must, in the first instance, be borne by them. When it is in operation, the expenses and charges of management should be borne by the concern, and then it may be fair that the preliminary expenses should be paid in the same way, for then the subscribers have the benefit of them. With respect to the supposed partnership, it is plain that there could be none, until the money was laid out in the execution of the proposed scheme."

If that case purported to have been decided upon purely legal reasoning, or if it had been followed by others, it would be, perhaps, useless to criticise it; but, as the principal ground of its reasoning is the presumption of a fact, from the existence of which an intention is inferred, and as it has not been followed by any other cases, it may not be improper or useless, in a legal point of view, to consider whether there is, in general, any good ground for presuming the fact, from which the intention of allottees is to be inferred, to be such as it was presumed to be in Noctels v. Crosby. Upon whom say the court, in that case, should the loss fall? Undoubtedly, if the scheme proves abortive, it should fall upon the original projectors, and not upon those who advance their money upon the faith of its going on. Now, this is precisely the assumption, the truth of which may, at this date at any rate, be questioned. Do persons asking for, and accepting, an allotment of shares, do so upon the faith of the scheme certainly going on? Let us, for a moment, consider what is the whole tenour of a railway company prospectus, and of the letter of application for shares. The prospectus, in its language, invariably and unmistakeably conveys the idea of a mere project being on foot; and it would require a person to be most singularly unacquainted with the nature of a railway project, in order to conclude, that, because it is projected, it must necessarily attain maturity. The application for shares also, when in the usual form, shows, upon the face of it, that the applicant knows he is proposing to take shares in something that is still incomplete, and may or may not go on to maturity. Many prospectuses, in terms, state, that the deposits will be required for the preliminary expenses; and, whether they do or do not, can any man say, when he subscribes to a mere undertaking, which, he knows, cannot pass through any preliminary stage without expense, and which, he must know, may fail to attain maturity, quite independently of any notion of the active promoters; can any man in his senses, subscribing under such circumstances, be heard to say that he did not advance, or contract to advance, his deposits, with a full knowledge, or with the full means of knowledge, that the payment of them could not ensure the completion of the project? Can he really say, in the language of Nockels v. Crosby, that he advanced his money upon the faith of the project going on? There is, clearly, we contend, no ground for imputing to a subscriber any such belief; and, therefore, it cannot be presumed to be the intention of the parties to such a contract, that, if the undertaking fails to proceed, the active promoters alone shall bear all the preliminary expenses. Besides, what is meant by the persons "who set a scheme afoot," or the "original projectors" of a scheme? Are not all the persons who join in carrying it forward, between the periods of its birth and of its attaining maturity, equally the original projectors? If the allottees are not, why are all the committee-men or directors to be so considered, without reference to their having been, de facto, the original proposers and projectors of the scheme, or having joined it after its original conception? When does a projected company begin, and when does it cease to be a mere project? If it has ceased to be a project before the final incorporation of the company, then omni ratio, according to Nockels v. Crosby, as to the non-liability of mere allottees; for their non-liability is put, in that case, on the ground that the objects of the company are but a project, an inchoate scheme; but, if it is merely a project, then, what is there in allottees to distinguish them from directors, so far as regards their character of projectors of the company? It should also be observed, in reference to the application of Nockels v. Crosby to cases of projected railway companies, that there were peculiar circumstances in that case. The principal business of the intended partnership was the laying out of and dividing the money subscribed, in a particular way, (on the principles of a tontine). The express contract was, that the money subscribed should be paid to trustees, and by them invested; the interest to be divided between the surviving shareholders at particular periods. It appeared, that, of the subscriptions paid, no part was ever invested at all. "It was the duty," said Bayley, J., "of the defendants, within a reasonable time, to lay out in securities the money received. They never did so, but kept it for eighteen months in their bankers' hands, and appear to have acted throughout as if they thought the undertaking must fail." This is a very different state of circumstances from that of a projected railway company, where money is subscribed professedly not to be invested, but to be paid away for active services, essential to the due bringing of the scheme before Parliament, the tribunal upon whose decision alone, its attaining maturity, or being altogether quashed, depends. It was not necessary in Nockels v. Crosby to put the case so high as to say that there was an implied contract that the scheme should succeed; there was an express contract that the money subscribed should be employed in a particular way, and it was not so employed. The express consideration, therefore, on which the money was paid, failed.

The truth seems to be, with regard to subscribers for shares in such undertakings as projected railway companies, that they are, ex necessitate rei, and unless they wilfully shut their eyes, perfectly well aware that they are advancing their money to forward an undertaking which must, in every stage, be attended with some expense, and the ultimate completion of which is a contingency; and their object is, by the advance of such sums as they undertake to pay by way of deposit, to entitle themselves to the profit which they hope may arise, with the perfect knowledge, that, in the event, it may turn out that no fruit will have arisen from the preliminary expenditure. If this be what, as ordinary men of business we know must be, the substantial understanding of the parties, then, does not a legal inference arise, that it is of the essence of the legal contract between a provisional committee and the allottees of shares, that the latter are intended to be (always supposing no fraud in the case) liable to contribute, by their deposits, to the preliminary expenses of the company, if it shall have failed to reach maturity? The legal inference being no more than that intention which, in the absence of express contract, the law will impute to the parties, upon the ground, that, looking at their relative situations, and the nature of the subject-matter of the contract, it would be contrary to justice and common sense to impute to them any other intentions.

The next material question for consideration on this subject is that of partnership; but this question is principally material, with a view to ascertain whether allottees of shares should be proceeded against at law or in equity. Fox v. Clifton, (6 Bing. 776), so continually cited in this sort of inquiry, certainly decides that persons having contracted to take shares in a company intended to be constituted upon terms not yet completed, and to possess a given capital not yet subscribed, are not partners with the promoters; and Nockels v. Crosby involves a decision to the same effect. It will be observed, however, that in Fox v. Clifton the question was not whether there was intended partnership inter se, but whether there was implied partnership as to third persons. And the court did not decide what was the relation between the promoters and the subscribers inter se. In Nockels v. Crosby, the promoters and subscribers were certainly held not even partners inter se. But in that case there was no partnership business contemplated, except the laying out of the money and dividing the proceeds of it. And neither in Fox v. Clifton, nor in Nockels v. Crosby, does the question appear to have been presented to the attention of the court, whether there may not be a present limited partnership as between the promoters of an intended commercial company and the subscribers, in the capital composed of the deposits and the preliminary business for which they are specifically applicable, independently of the future general partnership, in the commercial business intended to constitute the ultimate business of the company.

But this question is, as we have observed already, one affecting the jurisdiction under which relief is to be sought, rather than the right to relief. If it shall be finally determined that the provisional committee-men, or directors of a projected railway company, are not partners in any sense, then the only difficulty remaining in principle, (there may be many of form), as to proceeding against the allottees at law for their deposits, is, that which we have already discussed, viz. whether there is or is not an implied intention in the contract formed by the prospectus, the application, and the allotment, taken together, that the allottees shall contribute their shares of the preliminary expenses. If, on the other hand, it shall be determined that the promoters and allottees are partners, then we conceive that the Court of Chancery would find means consistently with authority, or, if need be, by creating a precedent, to avoid the difficulties interposed by the ordinary rules of pleading, in the way of the attainment of substantial justice.

Allottees, in fine, appear to us to be hung upon the horns of a dilemma. They may choose whether they will not be partners, and be sued at law; or whether they will be partners, and be sued in equity.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE JURIST.

THE JURIST of February 28th contains some remarks "On Descent among Coparceners." J. W., their author, names two or three of his contemporaries, whose opinions are contrary to those advocated. He might have added Mr. Shelford to the number.

The principle involved in the question is an important one; yet not only do we look in vain for any decision on the point under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, but we are no less baffled in attempting to elicit an authoritative reply from the more ancient oracles of law. There may no doubt be cases in which the identical question is raised; we, however, have been unable to find any such; and may fairly presume that the cases ingeniously brought forward by J. W. are the most decisive the books contain. When we come to examine them we think we shall be able to shew that they fail to establish his views.

The new Statute of Inheritance enacts, "that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser." (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, s. 2). Let us suppose that F. dies intestate, leaving two daughters, D 1. and D 2.; and that D 1. likewise dies intestate, leaving issue. The issue claim by descent, and the descent must be traced from the purchaser, or, in other words, the subject-matter of inheritance must devolve on the purchaser's heir. Now, D 2. and the issue of D 1. together constitute the composite heir of F. We maintain, therefore, that the subject-matter of descent, namely, the moiety held by D 1. till her death, and by that event set in motion, will devolve in equal moieties upon D 2. and the issue of D 1.; in other words, that D 2. will thus become possessed of three-fourths of F.'s estate, while D 1.'s issue will have only one quarter between them.

Under the old law, where seisin, not purchase, constituted the root of descent, we should have had a strictly analogous case had F. left two daughters, D 1. and D 2., his co-heirs, and had one of such coparceners died, leaving issue, before she or her sister had obtained seisin*.

There are two other cases in which the like difficulty seems to arise, as well under the old as the new law. The first is that of F., tenant in tail general, leaving at his death two or more daughters coparceners, one of whom dies, leaving issue.

The second is that of F., a purchaser in fee simple, devising to X. for life, and leaving at his death two or more daughters, (to whom the reversion expectant on the life tenancy descends), one of whom dies during the life tenancy, leaving issue.

* We are aware that it has been argued, that, under these circumstances, the descent of the entire estate must be looked upon as remaining open. We believe such a view to be contrary to law; for coparceners have, as between themselves, several freeholds, which we maintain might severally be subjects of descent even before actual seisin; and, in the analogous case of reversioners, we think it equally clear that the coparceners of the reversion would have several estates, which might severally become subjects of descent during the tenancy for life. We are not aware that it has ever been disputed that the shares of such reversioners might be effectually severed by alienation. But it is needless to perplex the subject under discussion by pursuing these collateral questions.

We have stated all these analogous cases, at the risk of being prolix, in the hope that they may tend to illustrate the question in all its bearings. One of these cases concerns the devolution of an estate tail; and, before proceeding further, we would take the opportunity thereby suggested of remarking on the plan pursued by J. W. in his inquiry. We cannot congratulate him on having followed the natural or logical order in first investigating the course of descent of an estate tail, and adopting the results so arrived at as a sort of foundation whereon to support his arguments as to the devolution of estates in fee simple; for, as saith Lord Coke*, "from this estate in fee simple, estates in tail and all other particular estates are derived; and therefore worthily our author (Littleton) beginneth his first book with 'Tenant in fee simple.'" Such a course would, we submit, have suggested more obvious and satisfactory solutions of the difficulties and anomalies which J. W. has not failed to attack with Quixotic courage, and to explain away with all the ingenuity of his favourite and subtle, but somewhat fanciful, author, Perkins.

Could we once fully satisfy ourselves of the exact course in which, under any given circumstances, a fee simple would have devolved, a fee tail need not, we think, cause much difficulty; and such difficulty would resolve itself simply into this: how was the course of devolution altered by cutting down a fee simple by restrictions confining the descent to lineal heirs of the donee, and the reservation to the donor of a reversion consequent upon the possible default of such lineal descendants of the donee? It is perfectly clear, that, except so far as the well-known words of the statute prevented, a fee tail devolved precisely as a fee simple would have done.

Such we believe to be the clue to the true explanation of such an anomaly as tenancy by the curtesy of an estate tail. Previously to the Statute of Westminster 2, the well-established rule of descent had been "Seisina facit stipitem;" and, from this reason, we do not doubt it was that seisin was one of the requisites of tenancy by the curtesy. By that statute, seisin, as regards estates in tail, became, in time, utterly inoperative for this purpose. It may, however, have taken time to establish such an interpretation of the statute, as that, on the death of a tenant in tail, the heir of such person must be passed over, and the heir of the original donee sought for; and meanwhile it may have been ruled that the husband of such tenant, if the old requisitions had been complied with, should, notwithstanding the statute, be tenant to the curtesy, and this rule may have been too firmly established to admit of alteration before its anomalous nature was thoroughly perceived. It is very unlikely that the framers of the Statute of Westminster 2 ever contemplated abolishing tenancy by the curtesy of estates tail. Add to which, that former usage, and in a feudal age many other causes, would have operated in favour of the claims of the widower against his issue; and thus a blind acquiescence with the former practice, regardless of the principle it had embodied, or a judicial timidity and disinclination to follow the statute to its fair consequences, and abolish tenancy by the curtesy of estates tail, may have rendered such estates exceptional cases, in which such tenancy was still allowed, although the general rule that the issue should claim as heir of the mother could not any longer be complied with: at all events, nothing can be more explicit than the terms in which the highest authorities lay down the rule, nothing more certain than the legal existence of tenancy by the curtesy of estates tail, notwithstanding. We hope our explanation of this anomaly will prove as sa-satisfactory as it is natural; and would proceed to suggest, that, at a later period, and when the rule of tracing to the donee was already established as the true interpretation of the statute, we may suppose the question as to possessio fratris in estates tail to have arisen, and a decision to have been come to consistent with the newly admitted principle of devolution on the heir of the original donee.

J. W. tells us that the Tenures of Littleton, as explained by Lord Coke's Commentary, supply us with an authoritative solution of our question as to estates tail. Littleton says, "Also, if lands or tenements be given to a man in tail, who hath as much land in fee simple, and hath issue two daughters and die, and his two daughters make partition between them, so as the land in fee simple is allotted to the younger daughter, in allowance for the lands and tenements in tail allotted to the elder daughter, or, if, after such partition made, the younger daughter alieneth her land in fee simple to another in fee, and hath issue a son or daughter and dies, the issue may enter into the lands in tail, and hold and occupy them in purparty with the aunt." (Litt., s. 200). Lord Coke's commentary is as follows: "Yet this partition, by matter subsequent, may become voidable," (as Littleton here puts the case); "the eldest coparcener hath, by the partition and the matter subsequent, barred herself of her right in the fee-simple lands, inasmuch as when the younger sister alieneth the fee-simple lands and dieth, and her issue entereth into half the lands entailed, yet shall not the eldest sister enter into half the lands in fee simple upon the alienor." (Co. Litt. 172. b.)

First, then, as to Littleton's authority. The question propounded by Littleton is merely, whether such partition allotting the land in tail to one coparcener and the land in fee to the other, who afterwards aliens the fee-simple land, would or would not be binding on the issue of the latter. He decides that such partition would not be binding, but that the issue might enter into the land in tail, and hold them in purparty with the aunt.

It is to be remarked, that the words "hold them in purparty" would be equally correct, whether the issue inherited one quarter or one-half of such lands. Littleton's attention, however, seems to have been entirely directed to the question, whether or no such partition would be binding on the issue; and the secondary question, "What share such issue would inherit," does not seem to have occurred to him. Littleton, then, is found to be no authority for J. W.'s interpretation. It is true that Lord Coke, in his Commentary, writes, "Inasmuch as when the youngest sister alieneth the fee-simple lands and dieth, and her issue entereth into half the lands entailed;" but we must observe, that he, too, is looking entirely to the same question, viz. whether or no the partition is voidable by the issue; and we submit that he used the expression "half" without considering whether, under the rule that the descent must be retraced from the ancestor, the aunt would or would not become entitled to three-fourths of the entailed lands. In fact, that, accurate writer as he is, he used the expression loosely; and, as others of our greatest authorities have at times done, while deciding one point in a case, did not perceive another which might also have been raised. At all events, it is, we maintain, false to every principle of true criticism, to wrest words so used by Lord Coke into a direct authority on this question.

"Yet," says J. W., "this incidental allusion of Lord Coke is as strong, if not stronger than a direct assertion by him of the doctrine; for it seems to shew that a doubt on the subject never entered into his mind." We, too, believe that no doubt on the subject ever entered his mind; but, instead of agreeing to J. W.'s inference therefrom, we reply, "Nay, rather it seems to shew, as the whole of the context does, that no thought on the subject ever entered his mind, which was wholly occupied in considering a different point." J. W.'s authority from the Year Books is of little more weight. The question there was not, any more than in Littleton, what share such issue would take in the lands entailed; and Lord Coke writes of this passage in the Year Books, "There is but the opinion of Newton obiter, by the way," and repeats that it is contrary to law. We argue that an obiter dictum, containing an error on a point to which Newton's attention was directly called by Yelverton's argument, can scarcely be relied on as an authority for a second point, to which there is no such reason to suppose his attention was directed. (Year Book, 20 Hen. 6. 14 a.)

J. W. next quotes Littleton, sect. 255. The subject considered in this section is, how far an unequal partition, made by parceners of fee-simple lands, concludes themselves and their issue. The words "may occupy in common &c., as if no partition had been made" are perfectly general, and would be equally correct, whatever shares might be taken in the lands so occupied in common. We cannot see how this section "tends strongly in (what J. W. terms) the same direction" or even how it tends more in one direction than the other; and we think that he must have been much at a loss for authorities, before he would have resorted to so imaginary a one as this.

We next come to the case of Doe d. Gregory and Geere v. Whichelo, (8 T. R. 211). J. W. considers this a clear authority on the point under discussion. We submit, that it is no such thing. For the case itself, which is lengthy, we must refer to the reports, and will only here remark, that J. W. takes no notice whatsoever of the points really raised. The effect of a fine not confirmed till after the death of the releasee was considered, and also the effect of possessio fratris under the circumstances of the case; but it seems never to have occurred to Holroyd, the counsel for the defendant, that the inheritance might have been repeatedly subdivided by various descents, and that his client might, in consequence, have been entitled to more than the one-third, to which the plaintiff's lessors did not deny his title. The point under our discussion was not raised in this case, and cannot, therefore, be considered settled thereby.

J. W. proceeds to inquire into the course of descent of an estate in fee simple according to the old law, in the case of F., a purchaser, having died leaving two daughters D 1. and D 2., and D 1. dying before seisin leaving issue,—as we suppose neither daughter to have obtained actual seisin, such issue must claim as heir to F. J. W. admits this, but argues, as he does in the case of a descent tail, that the issue would inherit D 2.'s entire moiety, not one-half of that moiety. He premises, that, if the heir of a person has been discovered for the purpose of a descent tail, it is obvious that the same individual would also be heir of the same person for the purpose of the descent of an estate in fee simple. He then assumes that he has established his view of the devolution of an estate in tail, and treats the devolution of an estate in fee simple as by consequence established also.

We deny that he has proved his position as to the course of a descent tail, and, therefore, need not say more as to his inferences therefrom. We must not, however, pass over in silence the passage which he has extracted from the Year Books (35 Hen. 6. 23) on this subject. In our opinion, it is by far the strongest point of his whole case; but we cannot allow that it is sufficient authority to trust to, when we find that the passage occurs in the course of a general argument as to joint actions, &c., and that the whole force of the illustration is derived from the parties to a joint action being entitled, nevertheless, to a special recovery according to their respective interests, and is quite independent of the particular fractional relations which those interests happen to bear to one another. It is, in fact, a mere obiter dictum,—an obiter dictum, too, which does not depend for its point on the special proportions supposed; and we think, also, that a little consideration will shew that the two cases, consecutively proposed in the passage, are somewhat contradictory the one to the other. The second of the two cases presumes that the surviving coparcener will recover one-half of the ancestor's land, and, it would seem, damages as to that moiety only from the death of the ancestor; and her two nieces the other half between them, and damages as to the moiety from the death of the deceased coparcener; but the former case does not equally uphold J. W.'s position. The case is that of two coparceners of a reversion expectant on a tenancy for life. Tenant for life commits a first act of waste, and then one coparcener dies leaving issue; tenant for life commits a second act of waste. In a joint action, the surviving coparcener and the issue recover the land wasted jointly, but surviving coparcener recovers treble damages for the waste done, as well as her partner's life as afterwards, while the issue only recovers for damage done since the mother's decease. It seems to us, that, in both cases, the damages due to deceased coparceners would not be recovered at all, as the representatives of the deceased coparcener are in both cases presumed only to recover damages from the death of their mother; and that the aunt would recover, admitting J. W.'s view, double damages only in both cases, and such is the natural interpretation of the words in the second case. We may, however, be mistaken in this, and do not lay any stress upon such discrepancy, as the cases at best serve as a mere incidental illustration, and are, therefore, of no weight as legal authority.

J. W.'s next argument is founded on another passage in Lord Coke's Commentary, (Co. Litt. 164. a.), which is, in reality, perfectly foreign to the question under discussion. The words are, "If a man hath issue two daughters and is disseised, and the daughters have issue and die, the issue shall join in a writ, because one right descends from the ancestor, and it maketh no difference whether the common ancestor, being out of possession, died before the daughters or after, for that in both cases they must make themselves heirs to the grandfather, which was last seized." And the clear and obvious meaning of the passage is simply that it makes no difference as to the form of action,—not that it makes no difference as to the interests of the daughters,—whether the common ancestor, being out of possession, died before the daughters or after. We cannot but think this argument of J. W. is forced,—we might add, forceless.

"It should be remembered," writes J. W., "that the rule of representation for which we are contending is the rule suggested by natural justice," &c. In this and the following remarks, it seems to us that the writer entirely misapprehends the true force and scope of the jus representationis. The rule, no doubt, is, "that the lineal descendants in infinitum of any person deceased shall represent their ancestor, that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living." The words have no such qualifications as "quoad his entire share," which J. W. elsewhere introduces; and the rule has nothing to do with any special question like the present, but is of general application, and must, in all cases where land devolves, guide us in distributing the inheritance among the representatives of the root of descent. It teaches us, in fact, that such an inheritance, in cases where it is partible, must devolve from some root per stirpes, and not per capita. There is nothing in the terms in which the rule is expressed to say that an estate, the descent of which from the root is broken by the death of the lineal descendant, and which must, therefore, confessedly, be retraced from such root, shall be guided by a different jus representationis to that which would prevail as to an estate, which might, by any other circumstances, be cast upon, and traced from such root.

Nor, in a critical point of view, will the words bear J. W.'s interpretation. In order to do so, they should have been "had he never died," or "had he continued to live." "In what case," proceeds J. W., "would the deceased daughter have stood had she been living? Would she have been heir to one-fourth only, or would she not rather have been heir to the entire one-half? Clearly to the entire one-half, for, had she been living, no descent of her moiety would have taken place," and we add, no tenancy by the curtesy either. In fact, the rule would have virtually amounted to this: that, if F. died leaving heritable issue, the immediate descent of F.'s estate should be exempted from the general rules of descent, and regarded as a survivorship in such case.

We would propose the following case for J. W.'s consideration. Let us suppose F., tenant of an estate in gavelkind, to have two sons, S 1. and S 2.; and let us suppose S 1. to become civilly dead by profession, leaving issue; let us now suppose F. to die, it is clear that the estate devolves in equal moieties to S 2. and the issue of S 1.; let us next suppose S 1., by the occurrence of the Reformation, or in any other way, to become civilly resurrected; and, lastly, let us suppose the issue of S 1. to become extinct, under these circumstances, one moiety of F.'s estate must be retraced from him as the root of descent. Will J. W. argue that such moiety will be cast entire, jure representationis, on S 1., to the exclusion of S 2.

From his remarks at the top of p. 75, J. W. does not seem to have perceived that the difficulty under discussion might readily have occurred without either sale of a reversion or entowment, for instance, by F. devising to X. for life, and then dying leaving daughter, one or more of whom might die during the life tenancy severally leaving issue.

We have, we allow, been unable to bring cases exactly in point, or decisive authorities, for our view of the ancient law of descent. We think, however, that we have shewn that J. W. has been unable to bring forward a single decision in his favour; that the cases he refers to contain little more than mere obiter dicta on the subject; that the authorities he quotes do not bear him out in his views; that his arguments fail in establishing his position; that his view is not within the terms in which the rule as to the descent of a reversion is uniformly laid down, namely, that the descent is to the heir of the person last seized; and that he is, accordingly, driven to qualify these terms by the addition of such expressions as "quoad &c."

Even had we allowed that he was correct as to the course of descent under the old law, such an admission (putting the new statute out of the question) would only amount to this: that the rule, as generally stated, being contrary to the cases and authorities, could not be considered law; but, in order to make it law, would require some such modification as the "quoad &c." suggested by him. The statute, however, entirely changes the effect of such an admission; for it contains no "quoad &c.," is express in its enactments, and, therefore, seems to us decisive on the question under discussion.

It seems to us, however, that this 2nd section may, by making purchase instead of seisin necessary to constitute a "root of descent," work a mischief more general and important than the one we have been discussing, although, to the best of our knowledge, it has never before been noticed as one of the possible results of the new law of descent.

What, we ask, under the new law, are the requisites necessary to make a tenancy by the curtesy? Hitherto the requisites have always been held to be four: mar-rage, actual seisin of the wife, issue, and death of the wife. And herein it is to be remarked, that seisin was a requisite, because it was by virtue thereof that the wife became a root of descent; without it, therefore, her issue could never inherit her estate as her heir, but was forced to try back, and make himself heir to the person last seised. Preston (Estate, 513) writes, "It is to the estate of the wife, and not to the land of which she is seised, that the issue must be inheritable." And again, (515), "And the title of the issue must be as heir of the wife; for, if they are entitled by purchase, as the first son of the husband or of the wife, or as heir of the husband, their birth will not entitle the husband." Does it not seem necessarily to follow, if they are entitled as heir to the grandfather or any more remote ancestor, their birth will, for like reasons, fail to entitle the husband? So, too, writes Coke, (p. 296), "And, therefore, where Littleton saith, issue by his wife, male or female, it is to be understood which, by possibility, may inherit as heir to her mother of such estate."

It is clear, therefore, that, as far as the rationale of this question goes, seisin has become not only unnecessary, but an absolute nullity. It has not, however, been simply annulled as a requisite to constitute a root of descent; for a new requisite, namely, purchase, has been substituted. Would it not, therefore, seem, that, under the new law, purchase must be substituted for seisin, as a fourth requisite to constitute a tenancy by the curtesy? if not, we shall see the anomaly of a widower claiming by the curtesy an estate, to which his deceased wife's issue cannot possibly inherit, as his deceased wife's heir, and with respect to which both the widower and the issue stand in precisely the same position as they would have done under the old law, had the wife neglected to obtain actual seisin.

We may also imagine the additional anomaly of the widower in this case holding, as tenant by the curtesy during his life, the whole estate of which his wife was seised, and the issue on his death succeeding, as heir to the last purchaser, to an inconsiderable portion of such estate only; but we are not ignorant that this might have happened, as to estates tail, under (what we argue to have been) the old law. Such a mischief we have termed more important than the one, which J. W. contends does not arise under this section of the act; and we think our position will not be disputed, when it is remembered that it does not only affect all coparceners, as well by common law as special custom, but also all heirs on whom land devolves in fee; and that it is not a question as to the larger or smaller fraction of the inheritance which shall devolve on their issue, but whether the person who, under the old law, was entitled as tenant by the curtesy, is not, by the new, wholly and absolutely deprived of such tenancy.

It can scarcely be necessary to remark, that the possibility of such doubts as those discussed by J. W., and those suggested by ourselves, makes it most desirable that no one on whom land devolves should delay doing some act of purchase to break the descent. "Rules of law," says J. W., in conclusion, "which have their foundation in natural justice, should ever be upheld, notwithstanding they may have become applicable to cases not specifically contemplated at the time of their creation." In this remark we entirely concur, but it must be proved that such rules are really applicable. We must be most careful not to apply them wrongly, and must remember that the most time-honoured maxims of the common law must not control, but must ever be controlled by the positive and express enactments of our statute book. Lord Coke, it is true, fondly dwells on the "great equity," as he terms it, "of the common law," till we find the laws starting boldly personified from his pages, and themselves affected with a commendable craving for equitable control: "Ipse etenim leges cupiunt ut jure regantur." (Co. Litt., passim). But such measures require to be scanned with critical and jealous care, and rhythm and reason alike warn us that the word "representationis" can find no place therein.

It does not help us that the framers of the statute probably never contemplated the present question, or the effect of illegitimacy, (see Sugd. V. and P. 231, 10th ed.), under the regulations they were enacting. The mischief has arisen, and the law has taken its course in the one case, (Doe d. Blackburn v. Blackburn, 1 M. & Rob. 547, Parke, B.), and so it must in the other. We think that it would have been better, notwithstanding the rule of possessio fratris, to enact, as the real property commissioners proposed, "that estates should pass to the heirs of the person who last died entitled, although he might not have had seisin." But we must take the law as we find it; and our province is, to consider what the true meaning of the act is—what its very words express. Its framers may not have foreseen possible results, or they may have made use of words which do not express what they intended should be expressed; but we must give them credit nevertheless for a mastery over their instrument—language; and must collect their intentions from their words, not adapt their words to their supposed intentions, as gathered from extraneous sources; we must, in fact, interpret the expressions of the Legislature, and must leave it to the Legislature to amend its own mistakes, if such there be.

Since writing the above remarks, a second article, by J. W., "On the Curtesy of the Husband of a Coparcener," has appeared in THE JURIST. We do not understand why he should restrict his remarks to the case of the husband of a coparcener; he might have written generally the husband of an heiress. It is most satisfactory to us to find that J. W. so far agrees with us as to allow that "it seems a fair and proper deduction from the authorities, that, whenever a woman has become entitled to lands by descent, her husband cannot claim his curtesy, because the descent of such lands on her decease is not to be traced from her." Such are his own words.

In order to avoid this deduction, J. W. boldly proposes that the authorities "are erroneous." When we state that Littleton is the person who lays down the rule in the express terms "as heir to the wife;" that the commentary of Lord Coke is as express, and even less capable of being explained away; that Blackstone, Hargrave, and Preston follow on the same side; the reader will scarcely be surprised when he finds us prepared to indulge a sort of legal prejudice, and take our chance with them, rather than with J. W. Paine's case likewise seems decisive on this point. (8 Rep. 36, a). We cannot admit that J. W. is successful in explaining away the express words of Littleton. We also submit that it is very unsafe to argue, as he does, from dower to curtesy; for we do not even know that the two tenures originated at the same period, or with the same race, and although it is true there are strong analogies between them, yet there are distinctions quite as strong. We might instance the well-known fact that tenant by the curtesy held immediately of the lord by a sort of continuation of his tenure during his wife's life; whereas a dowager held under the heir, who was liable to the lord for the services to which the land of which she was endowed was subject. Again, actual seisin was required as one of the requisites to constitute a tenant by the curtesy; whereas legal seisin was sufficient for the purpose of dower. And here we would remark, that J. W. lays great stress on the explanation which Lord Coke suggests as to this distinction; and does not hesitate, with no stronger arguments than this, to pronounce the highest legal authorities in error. We must, with all due deference, point out to him that Lord Coke is an authority we are bound to follow when he tells us what the law on any point is; but that when he tells why it is so, or how it became so, he is no longer an authority in the same sense, and we are at liberty to exercise our own discretion how far he is to be relied on.

* Although there is a difficulty in the following section, (Litt., sect. 53), from the use of the expression "as heir to the husband," yet nothing is clearer, that, in the case therein put by Littleton, in illustration of his meaning, the husband would be the stock of descent.

J. W. also deduces in this second article some further arguments from his views as to the "jus representationis." We must repeat that we think his application of this rule mistaken; must observe, in conclusion, that we doubt whether he is not wrong in flattering himself that he has arrived at the true principles of the old law; and, with more liberality than he manifests towards the superfluous "flourish," as he terms it, of Blackstone, take leave to add, "Floreat J. W., valeatque."

CRABE'S LAW OF REAL PROPERTY.

In 2 vols. royal 8vo., price 2l. 12s. boards.

THE LAW OF REAL PROPERTY IN ITS PRESENT STATE, practically arranged and digested in all its branches; including the very latest decisions of the Courts. By GEORGE CRABE, Esq., of the Inner Temple, Barrister at Law.

This Work, which has employed the Author's leisure time for upwards of ten years, is distinguished from every other in several particulars.

In the first place, it is confined to the Law in its Present State. Whatever is more matter of history has been excluded; and that which has been abolished by statute, but remains in force in respect of past transactions, has been briefly touched upon.

In the next place, it is confined to the Law as settled by the Decisions of the Courts, so far as anything in Law can be considered as settled. That which is confessedly not settled has been noticed, so as to show the state of the Law, without entering into discussions on doubtful points, which may be found treated of at large in other Treatises.

By thus confining the Work to what is wanted in ordinary practice, the Author has been enabled, without swelling it to an enormous size, to embrace the whole of the Law of Real Property, of which particular parts only are considered in other Works.

The Statutes on the Transfer of Property, though passed late in the Session, have been noticed in their proper places, as also the latest Decisions, including those of the present year until the closing of the Courts. A. Maxwell & Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

LONDON, APRIL 4, 1846.

In the House of Lords, on the 27th ultimo, a bill was read the first time for the Reform of Conveyancing, by extending to mortgages, settlements, sales, exchanges, wills, and farming leases, the blessings of the conveyancing statutes of last year, (8 & 9 Vict. cc. 119, 124); and, by way of meeting the difficulty that has arisen in respect to those statutes, out of the almost unanimous rejection of their benefit by the Profession, it is proposed to go as near as possible towards making the parliamentary forms compulsory, by authorising the taxing Master to disallow a long form, i. e. anything other than the parliamentary form, if he should be clearly of opinion that the shorter form would have sufficed. A grave responsibility, and no little labour of no little difficulty, will thus be thrown upon the taxing Masters, who will be obliged, whenever required so to do, perhaps, to read all the papers constituting the instructions for a draft—certainly to peruse the draft; and then to decide, whether, with the parliamentary form, all that is done by the draft can be as well done, or can at any rate be effectively done. To execute such a duty, would require the taxing Master to be an accomplished conveyancer; and it can scarcely be expected, that the same person, who is, probably, selected for the office of taxing Master for his great experience as a Chancery solicitor, and his minute knowledge of the details of bills of costs for all kinds of business done by a solicitor, shall have also had time and opportunity to qualify himself for determining whether conveyancing counsel, who do nothing every day and all day but prepare difficult drafts, have properly or improperly rejected the proffered aid of the mystic parliamentary columns.

It is a pity that it should always be assumed, as a matter of course, that every professional man who declines to acquiesce in the propriety of any given proposal for shortening conveyances, desires to perpetuate lengthy drafting, and, still more, that such imputed desire should be further imputed to sordid motives.

It is also a pity that legislators should have so decided a preference for doing things by a complicated process, when they might be done by a simple one. What is the ingredient in the legislative mind that leads to this result, it may be difficult to ascertain. Possibly there is a mental pleasure in dictating from within the walls of Parliament, the precise form in which men shall express their ideas. It has a certain aroma of despotism. It is a sort of ideal tyranny, sweet, perhaps, to the imaginations of men, who would, undoubtedly, shrink with horror from the exercise of actual despotism, if they had the power to exercise it, and who happily have not that power. Or possibly it may be that mistrust of the understandings of the vulgar, which is apt to suggest itself to minds long removed above their sphere; a mistrust which leads the minds of legislators, who, if they have ever prepared a draft of a conveyance, have long since been removed from the drudgery of chambers, to be willing to protect against the wanderings of their blindness, men who are still stumbling through the dark passages of daily practice with no wiser guides than a Duval, a Brodie, a Jarman, a Hayes, or similar rash, blundering, inaccurate, and inelegant draftsmen. Whatever is the source, however, of this manifestation of the parliamentary mind, certain it is that there is in that mind a tendency in matters of conveyancing reform, to create a language for the people, and to say, "Thus shalt thou speak, and not otherwise;" and, neglecting the simple means of reform offered by the mere abolition of the existing rules which check the endeavours of conveyancers to combine brevity with clearness, a tendency to attempt to force upon lawyers and laymen alike a compulsory style, which is brief, not because of its own force it expresses ideas in few words, but because it is to be declared by act of Parliament to mean a great deal more than it says.

The progress of the forms of conveyancing from shortness to inordinate length, and from that, backwards again towards conciseness, (for all conveyancers know that modern drafts are not half so verbose as their predecessors), may be traced and explained in this way. As interests in land became gradually the subject of complicated distribution, new forms of conveyances were pari passu invented. From time to time, the effect, not only of the new contrivances, but of the forms by which they were carried into operation, was the subject of litigation, and, at every fresh decision, some little addition to the formula was made to meet the rule laid down by each particular case, till at length the forms of conveyancing, towards the period when Mr. Bradley and Mr. Booth flourished, had arrived at a most unwieldy state of verbosity. Thenceforward they were subjected to revision, and gradually, by the critical emendations of such conveyancers as Mr. Butler, and Mr. Duval, and of the still more modern school led by Mr. Hayes, Mr. Jarman*, and other gentlemen of eminence, they have reached as concise a form as it seems probable that they will reach, so long as the secondary cause of verbosity, viz. the present ridiculous practice as to remuneration for drafts, is suffered to remain in force.

It is beyond doubt, that gentlemen in both branches of the Profession continually do, at personal sacrifice of emolument, consult the interests of their clients, and consume their own time, in carefully curtailing drafts where the property conveyed is small, not only not being compensated for the extra application of time, but literally receiving a smaller remuneration for their labour, than they would have done had they suffered the drafts to go forth in their original state. And why is this? Because it has always been and is still the practice, that the remuneration of the draftsman, be he solicitor or be he counsel, is to be regulated by the length of his draft. It is not to be expected that honourable men should purposely make drafts long in order to swell their gains; and they do not. But it is too much, on the other hand, to expect, that, when men find settled forms with an established import, which they can safely use, they are to sit down and rack their brains, in order to find ways of saying the same things in fewer words,—the inducement to such exertion being, that they will double their labours and halve their incomes. We say this is too much to expect of ordinary men.

But the remaining obstacle to the application of mind to the correction of verbosity in conveyancing being admitted, the simple remedy seems in its removal, not in the substitution, for present complication, of a new, and, therefore, pro tanto, more difficult complication. If Parliament, instead of busying itself to prepare skeleton drafts for all manner of conveyances, (which it never can do, so as to meet the exigencies of business, unless it publishes a sort of parliamentary "Bythewood"), would only leave men to prepare their own drafts, and give them the needful stimulus for the preparation of short drafts, by enacting, that, upon taxation, the fees and charges for drafts of every kind shall be regulated by reference to the difficulty of the business and the time employed, and not at all by reference to length, we should, in a very reasonable space of time, find conveyances brought down to the utmost conciseness compatible with definiteness and accuracy. We do trust that some members of one or other House will see this matter in its true light, and aim at reform, merely by removing the fetter of a ridiculous practice as to remuneration, instead of by imposing, or attempting to impose, the fetter of unmanageable parliamentary forms.

Imperial Parliament.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, March 27.

Lord Brougham moved the first reading of a bill relating to the conveyance of land. The bill contained formulae which would prove a great comfort to those who were interested in the subject, and perhaps a great discomfort to certain practitioners of the law—but for that he did not care; he looked to the interest of the client, not the solicitor,—to the courts, whose time would be spared, and to the client, whose purse would be saved. It was proposed to extend the provisions of the bill that applied only to the conveyance and sale of lands to mortgages, settlements, sales, and exchanges of all sorts, to wills and farm leases. The expense of conveyances was one of the greatest inconveniences landed proprietors were subjected to. The Committee on the Exclusive Burdens upon Real Property had collected evidence on this subject which was quite frightful. It was proved that the price of land, where the expense of conveyance was little or nothing—he could speak as to France, and there were witnesses who spoke as to Germany and Belgium—was thirty-five and thirty-six years' purchase, while in one country, where the conveyance cost little or nothing, it was as much as forty-eight or fifty years. Here the expense of conveying an acre of land was sometimes as great as that of conveying a large estate; the saving itself would be a great boon to the landholder. There was a reluctance among the Profession to use these forms, because they were not compulsory. He had been asked why they were not made compulsory—it could not be done. If practitioners chose to convey a piece of land by a long, rigmorole, and expensive deed, they could not compel them to use a shorter form. But he had introduced a clause in the present bill which he hoped would have this effect. In taxing costs it authorized the taxing Master to take the circumstances into consideration, and to disallow the long form if he should be clearly of opinion that the shorter and simpler form would have sufficed.

Lord Campbell expressed his concurrence with the measure proposed by the noble and learned Lord, but regretted that he should have cast the reflection he had done on the legal profession.

Lord Brougham by no means intended a reflection on the Profession in general: he had said only, certain practitioners, solicitors, and others were opposed to the measure; he believed that the greater number of intelligent men of the Profession were in favour of it.

Lord Beaumont said, the evidence taken before the Committee upon the Local Burdens on Land proved that the transfer of property was impeded by the present system, and the investment of capital in land lessened.

The bill was read a first time, and is to be read a second time after the Easter holidays.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor had appointed the following gentlemen Masters Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery:—Charles Steward, of Ipswich, Suffolk; John Thomas Tweed, of Lincoln.

* It would, perhaps, be improper to name living conveyancers, were it not that, both these gentlemen, having in various publications, recorded their opinions and their practice, have made their names public property.

GRANT'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, composed anew, and according to all the existing Operative Orders of Court, including the last of 8th May, 1845.

A. Maxwell & Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn; H. Sweet, 1 and 2, Chancery-lane; and V. and R. Stevens & G. S. Norton, 26 and 39, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

Of whom may be had, recently published,

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 6l. 10s. in strong cloth bds., BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE and PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Exeter District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of those Statutes the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superseding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fullness of the Marginal Note.

LONDON, APRIL 11, 1846.

THE Government proposes, it seems, to meet the conflicting clamours of railroad company promoters and allottees, by bringing forward a measure with regard to the winding up of the affairs of railroad companies, which, so far as we can gather its import from the speeches of Sir Robert Peel and the Earl of Dalhousie, appears to be of this general character: that, upon a majority of the shareholders in a railroad company desiring to stay proceedings in Parliament, and petitioning both Houses to that effect, an order shall be made staying all proceedings before Parliament in the matter until further order; and that, as to companies in various stages of advancement or of failure, upon a majority of the shareholders desiring to wind up their concerns, and petitioning both Houses of Parliament to that effect, a sort of trustee or official assignee shall be appointed, to collect the assets and pay the debts of the company, and to divide the balance, if there be any, among the shareholders and other parties entitled. This seems the general outline of the plan which is thrown out now, in order that promoters and shareholders of companies may consider it between this and the bringing in of the bill, which is to take place immediately after the Easter holidays. We remember a saying of an ancient worthy, "That all that he knew well was, that he knew nothing;" and, in like manner, we think, that all one can say of the proposed measure is, that he can say nothing! The essence of such a measure resides in its details, or, at least, in the general arrangement of its specific details; and to tell anxious and expectant promoters and allottees, that, by some machinery, in which a trustee is to figure, and that is literally all that is told them, their disputes shall be settled, their anxieties allayed, their liabilities determined, is a piece of the merest oratorical mockery that ever proceeded from parliamentary lips, wrapped up in a cloud of parliamentary commonplaces. If it were intended in earnest that the parties interested in such undertakings should have the opportunity of considering the projet de loi before its formal proposal to Parliament, the bill should have been prepared, and its proposed enactments specifically announced, even should the forms of Parliament not render it expedient actually to read it as a bill. As it is, all that we know is, that there is to be a trustee, who, by some "machinery," as it was described, is to arrange all things; but what that machinery is, Parliament was not told; and, therefore, neither we nor any other persons interested in the objects of the proposed act can tell what it is that is to be considered,—what that is upon which representations, or petitions, or suggestions are to be sent forth between this and the post Easter parliamentary sittings.

We can, however, form an opinion as to the points which should be considered and provided for in any act of Parliament professing to intend the adjustment of the relative claims and liabilities of promoters of railroad companies, allottees in such companies, and third persons contracting with them. On those points we shall offer a few observations.

Whatever may be the arrangements proposed as between promoters and shareholders, whatever may be the new relation which, as between those parties, may be thought to exist, founded upon any implied contracts arising out of that general knowledge of the nature of company speculations, which it would be absurd, at this day, not to impute to all persons sui juris and composites mentis, few, we believe, could be found to assert that there is any circumstance in the new order of things—any sufficiently new relation between companies, or their representatives, and third persons—which could justify any interference with the rules of law now existing for the protection of such third persons. The rights of persons dealing with and supplying companies with goods or labour, whether through provisional committees or directors, or otherwise, ought, therefore, and we have no doubt will be left as they now are as law and in equity. If facilities can be afforded for enforcing such rights with a saving of time or expense to either party, that will be a proper object of legislation; but we apprehend that it will not be thought a legitimate object in any measure, to diminish such rights, either as to their extent, the directness and simplicity of the remedies for enforcing them, or the expedition with which they can be enforced.

With regard to the relative positions of promoters and shareholders, the case may be different. It may not be unjust in the abstract, or impolitic as to future transactions, to impute, in point of law, to persons contracting to take shares in railroad or other speculative companies, that knowledge which, in society, every man of the world would think himself deeply insulted in being supposed not to possess; but it does not follow that it would be just to adopt such an imputation in an act operating retrospectively. We apprehend, therefore, that the bill intended to be proposed ought to be severely criticised, if it proposes to alter the legal rights of shareholders in existing schemes; that it ought, therefore, in fixing the powers and duties of the proposed trustee, to leave as they now are, at law and in equity, the rights and liabilities of shareholders and promoters inter se, only providing definite and, if possible, cheap and expeditious modes of enforcing those rights and liabilities.

It would, no doubt, sound very well in an oration, and would have a pretty systematic and orderly air, to make allottees liable in all cases to contribute, for instance, to the preliminary expenses of an undertaking; or, on the other hand, to make them wholly irresponsible, leaving all the onus upon the promoters. But, if the law is now, that under certain circumstances an allottee is not liable, and that under certain others he is, there can be no good reason for reversing the liabilities, and, by an ex post facto law, committing an injustice for the sake of symmetry. The parliamentary trustee ought, therefore, we conceive, to have as many executive facilities as possible, but no powers or rights inconsistent with the existing legal and equitable rights of all his cœstui que trustent.

In the speeches announcing the proposed measure, not a word is said about how the trustee is to collect the assets of a company,—what are to be his powers,—how he is to sue or be sued,—how the great stumbling-block, the question of parties, is to be dealt with, &c. Of course, these, and other practical difficulties, which are in fact the principal, if not the only, present difficulty, will be dealt with by the bill. But, again, we must ask, what Legislators mean by offering for the consideration of the parties concerned, during the Easter holidays, the vaguest generalities, on a subject on which the necessity for legislative interference arises almost entirely from obstructions and difficulties in matters of detail, and in the smallest possible degree from any difficulty as to broad principles.

OBSERVATIONS ON BROWN v. ANNANDALE, (WEBSTER'S PAT. CAS. 433).

It is well known, that, in respect to the grant of letters-patent, distinct grants are made for England, Scotland, and Ireland respectively. The letters-patent for England issue under the Great Seal of England; those for Scotland under the seal appointed by the treaty of Union to be used in the place of the Great Seal of Scotland; and those for Ireland under the Great Seal of Ireland; and the privileges granted are for most purposes distinct. Thus, there can be no doubt that the possession of letters-patent in England, would not entitle the patentee to prevent the use of his invention in Scotland; nor, on the other hand, if there be a patent in England, could a person making or purchasing the patent article in Scotland, bring it to England for the purpose of trading. Whether a subject of the Queen, purchasing in Scotland or Ireland an article for which there is a patent in England, might bring it to England for the purpose of personal use, and whether, if he died in England, it might be sold there as part of his estate, has been doubted; and to this question Lord Eldon said he did not know an answer. (Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 709).

Until the decision of the House of Lords in Brown v. Annandale, (Webster's Pat. Cas. 433), it was generally thought that the three kingdoms were so distinct with reference to patent rights, that user of an invention in one of the three branches of the United Kingdom would not, of itself, invalidate the subsequent grant of letters-patent for such invention in either of the other branches. Brown v. Annandale, however, following the older, and till then but little known case of Roebuck v. Stirling, (cited in Brown v. Annandale), has put an end to that notion, so far, at least, as regards the validity of a Scotch patent taken out after the invention has been in use in England. Some slight shadow of doubt may still exist, perhaps, whether prior user of an invention in Scotland would, upon the authority of Brown v. Annandale, invalidate letters-patent obtained in England; because, in Brown v. Annandale, much stress was laid upon the terms of a Scotch patent, which are, in some respects, different from those of an English patent. The English patent recites that the petitioner has represented to the Crown that he is the inventor of the particular invention, and that the same is new in England, Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and then goes on to grant the exclusive rights conferred by the letters-patent; concluding with a proviso that the same shall be void, if (inter alia) the invention shall be shewn not to be new "within that part of the United Kingdom called England, the Queen's dominion of Wales, and the town of Berwick-upon-Tweed."

A Scotch patent, after stating what the petitioner says he has invented, continues the recital thus: "Quam inventionem credit pro generali beneficio et commode futuram esse; dictam inventionem novam esse, et haud unquam ante hoc factam aut usitatam per ullam aliam personam aut personas quascunque intra hæc regna," (not "predictam partem &c.," vocatam &c.") And then the condition is in the same terms as in the English patent: "Proviso semper, &c., dictam inventionem quoad publicum usum ejus, in illa parte Regni nostri Unitæ Scotia vocata, usum et exercitum non esse," &c. On this Lord Campbell observed, "How can you apply 'hæ regna,' in the recital, to Scotland only?" And, further, "An English patent might remain good with the old form of proviso, notwithstanding the Union, although a Scotch patent might not be so. I do not mean to say that that is so. The Crown would not then be deceived in its grant, and the patent valid on that account." However, although one ground of the decision in Brown v. Annandale, besides the authority of Roebuck v. Stirling, appears to have been the construction put upon the words "hæ regna" in the recital, as being a false recital, and, therefore, a deceit upon the Crown, the broad ground of the decision (so far as it was a decision upon principle, irrespective of the authority of Roebuck v. Stirling) seems to have been, that, upon the true construction of the statute of James I, the Crown has no power to grant letters-patent for an invention, unless it is new in the whole realm. If that is the true ground of the decision in Brown v. Annandale, it would follow, that, generally, previous user of an invention in either of the three branches of the United Kingdom, or, in fact, in any locality being part of the realm, will, of itself, invalidate the subsequent grant of letters-patent for such invention, in either of the remaining branches.

From this doctrine some very singular and unforeseen consequences may flow. One is, that involved in the question suggested by Mr. Webster, in the notes to his report of Brown v. Annandale, (Webster's Pat. Cas. 454), Whether the decision will apply to a case in which the true and first inventor in one part of the realm, is the grantee of the letters-patent in the other part. We certainly do not see why it should not. The fact that avoids a grant of letters-patent for a particular invention, under Brown v. Annandale, is the fact of its antecedent publication. What can it matter by whom, or how, that publication is made? It is quite clear, that, if A. publishes in fact his own invention in England, he cannot afterwards sustain a patent for it in England. It is equally clear, that, if he publishes it in law, that is, if he obtains a patent, and afterwards files a specification, (which would be a publication in law), he could not afterwards procure the first letters-patent to be set aside, and obtain new letters-patent. Why, then, should the fact, that a publication in Scotland is merely a publication in law, by reason of the true inventor obtaining letters-patent and filing a specification, (which would undoubtedly prevent his afterwards obtaining valid letters-patent in Scotland), prevent the operation of the doctrine of Brown v. Annandale, so as to preclude him from obtaining valid letters-patent in England? It may seem a hardship, that the rule should go so far, and, if the rule be so, it may cause many inconveniences; but we conceive that the rule laid down by Brown v. Annandale is, that the invalidity of letters-patent will be the consequence of the mere fact of antecedent publication of the invention in any other part of the realm, and that there is nothing in that case to authorise the assumption, that publication of any particular kind was meant.

However, whether this is a correct view of the rule or not, it is, at any rate, so far from clear that it is incorrect, that it will behave an inventor (when he can) so to arrange matters, if he intends to take out patents in more than one of the three kingdoms, as that the specification of his invention shall not be filed in either kingdom, until after the letters-patent are sealed in the other. If he does not take this precaution, he incurs great risk of losing his right in one or other of his patents, under Brown v. Annandale.

Another question of some difficulty and great importance, is that which we gather to be suggested by the argument of Sir F. Pollock, (Webster's Pat. Cas. 446, 447), whether every English patent, at least, granted according to the form and under the practice in use before Brown v. Annandale, is not void, on the ground, that, if the Crown has no power to grant letters-patent except for an invention new in the whole realm, then, first, it ought not to grant them except upon a suggestion that the petitioner has brought himself within the statute; and, secondly, it ought not to grant them with a condition falling short of the condition that the statute requires*. The suggestion of the petitioner in every petition for an English patent, before Brown v. Annandale, was merely that the invention was new in England. He did not, therefore, suggest and swear to all the facts requisite to empower the Crown to grant him a patent. It might be within the knowledge of the petitioner, at the time of presenting his petition, that the invention was not new in the whole realm; and it might happen, that, afterwards, all evidence of the fact would be lost, except that possessed by the petitioner; and the result would be, that, by omitting to suggest and swear to the fact of novelty in the whole realm, the petitioner would be in truth deceiving the Crown into making a grant that ought not to have been made. The question, therefore, is, ought it in point of law to be intended, that the Crown means to grant a right, which it has no power to grant, except to a person possessing specific qualifications, and in reference to a thing possessing specific attributes, upon a suggestion and affidavit failing to allege and prove some of the requisites?

On the second point, can a grant by the Crown be sustained, which, by declaring that it shall be void if the invention is new only in England, impliedly purports to be good, notwithstanding the invention may not be new in another part of the realm, contrary to the statute under which the Crown derives its power? To say, that, by the express condition, the Crown does not intend to imply, that, so far as novelty is concerned, the grant shall be good if that condition is complied with, is to impute to the Crown a surprise and intended fraud upon the grantee, which, of course, cannot be imputed to the Crown; while, if we say that the Crown did not mean to practise a fraud upon the grantee, then we fall into the assertion, that it meant to make a grant contrary to law, which would, of course, be void. The latter seems technically the view most consonant with legal reasoning.

We do not, of course, for one instant, affect to defend the common sense of these arguments. They are of the extremest technicality, and their consequences, if they prevailed, would be absolutely frightful. But it is not clear, for all that, that a court of law could escape from them, without overturning settled doctrines of law touching the validity of grants by the Crown.

* This doubt seems also to be sanctioned by an observation of the Lord Chancellor. The counsel for the appellant having observed, in his argument in favour of the validity of the grant, "that the respondent claimed to control the prerogative—that the said letters-patent ought to have an additional or more restrictive proviso;" the Lord Chancellor said, "If the proviso is made more extensive than the law authorises, it would no doubt be void by the statute." The writer apprehends, that his Lordship was here referring to the very question, whether a proviso, that, if the invention should appear not to be new in England only, the grant should be void, would be a sufficient proviso; or whether it ought not to have gone on to say, that the patent should be void if the invention was not new throughout the realm. It must be observed, however, that, throughout the case of Brown v. Annandale, the observations of the learned Lords appear, according to Mr. Webster's report, to have been merely by way of passing comments upon the arguments, and were probably scarcely intended to go forth as even dicta.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I have read the two articles on this subject which recently appeared in THE JURIST, with equal astonishment, and am still at a loss to decide whether J. W.'s conclusion, or J. C. C.'s argument against it, be most worthy of admiration.

When J. W. expounds the rules of the common law, and their application to particular cases, no one can desire a sounder or more perspicuous guide; but when he misapplies his common-law deductions to the entirely new circumstances created by an act of Parliament, one is tempted to exclaim—

"Ah me! what eyes hath Coke put in thy head,
That have no correspondence with true sight!
Or if they have, where is thy judgment fled,
That falsely censures what they see aright?"

J. W. may have proved, for aught I know, that at the common law an estate could not have been subdivided by the effect of successive descents, in the manner which, according to a very prevalent opinion, is possible under the existing law; but he has omitted to supply one essential link to the chain of his argument, which is, the proof that the kind of successive descent which has been created in certain cases by act of Parliament could have happened under any possible circumstances at common law.

The stat. 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, s. 2, enacts, "that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser." The question is, how does this enactment operate in the case of the death of a coparcener who has not created a new estate by purchase in her share? And, for the solution of the question, the act does not afford another explanatory word, except that, in defining the word "purchase," it speaks of "the land" as the subject of descent. It has no preamble; and all that we can gather from the interpretation clause about descent is, that it shall include the flight of an estate upwards to an ancestor, contrary, as Lord Coke suggests, to the laws of gravitation.

"In every case descent shall be traced" &c. That is to say, whenever the question is,—who shall inherit "land?" the descent shall be traced from the purchaser. The descent of what? Clearly of "the land" to be inherited, and of nothing more. For a reason which will appear presently, I will put the case thus: Two co-heiresses, A. and B., make partition by a conveyance of Whiteacre to the use of A., and Blackacre to the use of B.; the effect of which is, that, under the old law, each becomes seised in deed of her share in severalty, but without breaking the descent, or becoming a "purchaser" under the statute. On the death of A. without having disposed of her share, something must descend on some person or persons. What is it that descends? Under the old law, it would have been A.'s share in severalty, and under the statute it is the same. It is enacted, "that in every case descent shall be traced from the purchaser." The "case" here is as to the descent of Whiteacre. Descent of what? Of that which is to descend. Question as to the descent of Blackacre there is none, for its owner is alive, and in the actual seisin as heir. Then, can any argument be framed, that shall even appear to refute the plain conclusion, that the heir or heirs of the purchaser of Whiteacre shall inherit Whiteacre? or this deduction therefrom, that, as a daughter of the purchaser of Whiteacre survives, the issue of his deceased daughter cannot be entitled to the entirety of Whiteacre?

This being the plain and only meaning of the words employed by the Legislature, and there being no key whatever to the intention, can it be doubted that the courts must give effect to the words accordingly, however repugnant this may be to ordinary notions? When the absurd rule of excluding the half-blood was criticised, Blackstone thought it sufficient to reply, with the most benignant serenity, that rules of inheritance are matters of merely arbitrary institution; that the descent of estates to collaterals of the whole blood, instead of to the Grand Turk, was an indulgence for which we have too much reason to be grateful, &c. If such arguments as these are sufficient to vindicate the superhuman wisdom of the common law, surely they are available on behalf of the Legislature, from which, at the present day, when it meddles with the law of property, anything short of downright unintelligible absurdity is accepted as a boon.

It having been, in substance, enacted, by words which are incapable of two constructions, that, after an entire estate has descended to the heirs of a certain person, a portion of that estate may descend to the heirs of the same person, it behoves J. W., before he can make use of any authority as to descent at common law, to prove that such a case of successive descent was possible before the statute. Has he done so? I am not hardy enough to dispute his authorities, as J. C. C. does, or to assert, with J. C. C., that such lawyers as Littleton and Coke were likely to forget all their learning, except so far as it might bear on the very question, for the time being, under consideration. I fully admit all that is expressed and implied by J. W.'s authorities; but I deny that they are in point.

His first case is that of an estate tail. But whenever an estate tail descends, the descent is, per formam doni, of the entire land to the heir of the donee. On every descent of an estate tail the intent of the donor is observed. But the donor's intent was never expressed with regard to the descent of a portion only of the land. If the enjoyment of a portion of the land according to the gift is hindered by any means, that circumstance cannot be looked at in a question arising exclusively among the issue of the donee. If a daughter has levied a fine, her issue are barred by the fine from claiming contrary to its terms; but that can give them no right to recompense from their kindred. If the share of a coparcener has passed by a feigned recovery, it is represented by the fictitious recompense in value. But, says J. W., when an estate tail descends on two daughters, A. and B., and A. dies, her share must descend to the heirs of the donee, including B. according to the opinion which he controverts, but excluding her according to his authorities. Now, I admit that he accurately lays down the rule of descent of an estate tail, after the Statute de Donis,—a rule created by the courts in consequence of that statute, and not repugnant to the very vague and inaccurate terms in which it is expressed; but I say that the case of a fee simple was entirely different, and that J. W.'s position, (echoed by J. C. C.), that, if the heir of a person had been discovered for the purposes of the descent of an estate tail, the same individual would also be heir of the same person for the purposes of the descent of an estate in fee simple, is quite erroneous. The coincidence was always accidental. He will not deny this, upon a case being put. Suppose Charles Smith, donee in tail male of Whiteacre, and purchaser in fee of Blackacre, to leave a son John and a daughter Jane by a first wife, and a son James by a second wife. John enters on both estates, and dies without issue male. James will take Whiteacre, and Jane or John's issue female, as the case may be, would, at common law, take Blackacre. Other cases might be put, as of a fee simple by descent from the mother, &c. The case which J. W.'s argument requires, of a descent at common law of a moiety of an estate in fee simple to the heir of the purchaser of the entirety, cannot be found.

Before the statute, a gift to a man and the heirs of his body was a fee simple conditional, and, so long as it was not aliened, would descend to the lineal heirs of the donee, to some extent according to the form of the gift, but subject to qualifications and exceptions, which I defy any one to reconcile and explain, on any principle which shall be consistent with the authorities. The truth is, that, in this, as on many other points, the old lawyers were far more astute, than accurate or consistent. The courts, in applying the Statute de Donis, interfered only so far as was necessary to secure the substance of the will of the donor, and "created," as Littleton says, the estate tail, with all its anomalies, rejecting possessio fratris, admitting curtesy and dower. These anomalies did not exist in the case of a descent in fee simple; and the rules which governed estates tail were quite peculiar, and furnished no guide to the determination of questions affecting descents in fee simple. On the contrary, so far from descents in tail and in fee simple to lineal issue being under the old law identical or similar, they were distinguished by the most striking differences. Of an estate tail there might be successive descents to the heir of the same person, which could not be of a fee simple. An estate tail descended, according to peculiar rules, to the heir of the purchaser; a fee simple descended to the heir of the person last seised: and a fee simple would not descend to any issue of the purchaser, who was not of the whole blood to the person last seised; a fee tail was subject to no such restriction. In fine, the case of an estate tail affords no parallel to the case in hand, because all the rules with respect to estates tail have for their object the fulfilment of an intention expressed with reference to one entire estate, while the enactment in question has reference to nothing but the immediate subject of descent, whenever descent happens.

J. W.'s observations on the descent of a fee simple at the common law prove merely this: that the editor of Bythewood, when he suggests, (vol. 1, p. 139), that, on the death of a coparcener before entry, her share would have descended under the old law as it now does under the statute, and J. C. C., who agrees with him, are both in error. But J. W. is equally in error, in supposing that there is, in the proposed case, any descent at all of the share of the deceased heiress, as such. The case is simply this: On the death of the person seised, the right to the inheritance descends on the heir, and if such heir enter, his title is perfected; but, in the meantime, he has nothing but an inchoate right, which is assets, indeed, for some purposes, (3 Vin. Abr. "Assets," A. 3), and liable to dower, (instances of the law's tenderness to creditors and widows, by prolonging in their persons, in a qualified way, the life and identity of the deceased heir), but which right, on the death of the heir without entry, is at an end; so that, until the heir for the time being enters, there is no complete descent. The inheritance remains vacant until entry, and, from the death of the person last seised to the entry of his heir, there is but one descent; and the case is the same under the statute. If the deceased owner has left two daughters, A. and B., until one of them enters, (for the benefit of both*), the inheritance is vacant; and, on A.'s death leaving a son, such son has an inchoate title to a moiety, not because he is heir to his mother, and as on a new descent, but because there is a descent from his grandfather, which has not yet been perfected by entry. For the purpose of designating the heir, then, (and independently of the rights of dowresses, creditors, &c., anomalies tolerated on grounds of policy or justice), there was, at the common law, in each of the cases put by J. W., and is still, but one single descent, perfected by the first entry of the coparcener or her representative, and not, as he would have us believe, successive descents, such as the recent statute has introduced in cases where the deceased has acquired seisin; for it is to be observed, that the construction of the statute which I am advocating makes no change, except where the deceased coparcener had acquired seisin, so as to create a new descent, the statute not creating several descents where there was formerly only one, but merely introducing a new rule for ascertaining the heir in certain cases.

J. W. notices, as an objection to the proposed interpretation, the anomalous consequence, that the husband of the deceased coparcener would be tenant by the curtesy of a larger share than would descend to her son. But the question is not what share her son would take, but what share her heir would take. But his favourite common law did allow of a similar anomaly to that which he unjustly charges on the new law: a widow is endowed of one-third of the inheritance; but, if an heir died before seisin, and his widow claimed her dower, his heir, by the retrospective effect of the widow's seisin, became entitled to one-third of the estate, subject to the widow's life estate in the entire share thus inherited.

I will conclude with one word on J. W.'s difficulties as to curtesy. It seems to me that he entirely mistakes the operation of the enactment. What shall be a descent, and from whom an estate shall descend, are questions which the act leaves untouched. On the death of the purchaser's daughter after entry, her son and his aunts take by descent from the daughter, and as her heir: the act has performed its office when it has furnished the rule for ascertaining these persons. If this were not so, the deceased daughter's share would not be assets for payment of her debts. So, under the old law, you traced your descent through (and, therefore, from) a common ancestor, but you did not inherit as his heir. The old rules as to curtesy, therefore, remain unaltered, and even the requisite of seisin seems to be as essential as formerly. Any argument founded on the irrationality of requiring seisin might, indeed, be answered by reference to the case of an estate tail, to which, as J. W. has shewn, the commonly-assigned ground for requiring actual seisin does not apply. But, however this may be, the fact is, that the statute has made no change; for, in the case of the death of an heiress coverte before entry, there was (as we have seen) no fresh descent; it was the old descent from her ancestor which remained open; and, as the statute does not make a descent where there was none before, it is to that old descent alone that the statute applies. The unexpected result is, that, in every case where a coparcener has died, the inquiry as to whether she was actually seised or not is as important now as it was (under different circumstances) at the common law, although the principal object of the enactment was to render the question of seisin immaterial in every case.

MASTERS IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed the following gentlemen Masters Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery:—Octavius Green, of Cambridge; Montague George Smith, of Hemel Hempstead, Hertfordshire.

POOR LAW COMMISSIONERS.—The following gentlemen have been appointed Assistant Poor Law Commissioners:—John Thomas Graves, Esq., of the Inner Temple; and John Ball, Stephen's Green, Dublin, for a period of six months from the 2nd April. The last-mentioned gentleman has likewise been directed to carry into effect the provisions of the "Act for the more effectual Relief of the destitute Poor in Ireland."

* The enactment of the Statute of Limitations, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, "that the possession of one coparcener shall not be the possession of the other," has been cited, as if it bore upon questions of descent. It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the enactment meant only possession for the purposes of that act.

LONDON, APRIL 18, 1846.

THERE have been several cases lately decided in the courts of common law, in which the rules of pleading as to new assignments in actions of trespass and trover have been explained or in some degree altered. These cases, although, as relating to the doctrines of special pleading, they are practically important to a part only of our readers, are yet, as affecting the trial of a cause, and the preparation of evidence for it, desirable to be noticed beyond those limits. We, therefore, deem no apology necessary for the following account of them.

In the first of these cases, Bracegirdle v. Peacock, (ante, p. 9; 15 Law Journ., N. S., Q. B., 73), a declaration in trespass stated, that defendants, on &c., and on divers other days and times between that day and the commencement of the suit, with force and arms, &c., broke and entered a certain close of the plaintiff, situate and being &c., and then and there cut down, prostrated, and destroyed the rails and palings of the plaintiff then standing and being in the said close, to wit, 100 yards of rails and 100 yards of paling. The pleas were, first, not guilty by statute; secondly, no notice of action pursuant to the statute, under the authority of which the trespasses were committed; thirdly, a common public highway; and, because the rails and palings had been wrongfully erected, and were standing in and across the highway and obstructing the same &c., the defendants, in order to remove the obstruction, cut down, prostrated, and a little destroyed the said rails and palings, doing no unnecessary damage. The fourth plea was similar, except in alleging the removal to be under the authority of a local act. The replication to the third and fourth plea denied that the rails and palings were standing in and across the highway and footway, in manner and form &c. At the trial it was proved that the defendants had cut down six feet in length, in three places, of the rails upon the close of the plaintiff. The defendants proved a right of way across the close, and the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff upon the first and second issues, damages 1s., and found that part only of the rails cut down were on the footpath, upon which the judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants on the third and fourth issues, being of opinion, that, if any of the rails were upon the footpath, the plaintiff should have new assigned; and this the court held to have been rightly done. "We are of opinion," said the court, "that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that, as the number and quantity of the rails were immaterial, and alleged generally in the declaration, and divisible, if the plea, which apparently covered the whole, answered a part only, the plaintiff ought to have new assigned, if he meant to insist that some of the rails were not standing upon the way, though others were. The case of Bowen v. Jenkin (6 Adol. & Ell. 911) is directly in point. That was an action for disturbing plaintiff's common by turning on cattle. The defendant pleaded a right of common for cattle levant and couchant. The plaintiff replied, that all the cattle in the declaration mentioned were not levant and couchant, and issue was joined. It appeared by the evidence, that, at the time of the injury complained of, some of the cattle were levant and couchant, and others not; and it was held that the effect of the plaintiff's replication was, that the levancy and couchancy was untrue alleged by the defendant of all the cattle, not that it was truly alleged of some, and falsely of others. The plea answered the complaint as to some of the cattle; and if the plaintiff meant to draw a distinction between such of the cattle as were really included in the justification and such as were not, he should have new assigned. The present case falls within the rule collected from a review of the older authorities laid down in the note to the case of Gross

v. Jones, (1 Saund. 298, 300), that, where the declaration is general, and the subject-matter divisible, and the plea apparently answers the whole, but really only answers a part, the plaintiff must new assign as to the part not really answered. The defendants, by their plea, say, that the plaintiff has complained of cutting rails in the highway; and if the plaintiff merely traverses the allegation that the rails were in the highway, and some of the rails cut actually were there, it will be taken that both parties agreed that those were the rails in question; and if the plaintiff meant to shew that the plea applied to part only, and not to the whole, he should have new assigned. Such a traverse as that taken by the plaintiff does not deny the quæ est eadem, but admits it. The case of Barnes v. Hunt (11 East, 451) was much relied upon for the plaintiff; but it must be considered an authority only with respect to the plea of leave and license, as observed by Littledale, J., in the case of Bowen v. Jenkin. Our judgment, therefore, is for the defendants."

The case of Barnes v. Hunt, (11 East, 451), which has often been quoted as an authority, that a plea of license to a declaration alleging several trespasses must be understood as applying to each, and that it is necessary to prove a license co-extensive with the trespasses proved at the several days and times included in the declaration, must now be considered, if not as overruled, at least as so much shaken that it cannot safely be acted upon, for, in addition to what is said upon it in the judgment above quoted, Patteson, J., upon its being quoted in the course of the argument, said, "It, viz. the doctrine that the evidence should be co-extensive with the statement in a plea of leave and license, is not to be extended to any other case, even if it can be maintained in that, which is very doubtful. . . . The court did not like to overrule it; but, with very great submission, it is full of fallacies: among others, it assumes that the plea professes to answer several trespasses." In the last case, the want of a new assignment is illustrated; the next points out where a new assignment is not to be allowed.

Polkithorn v. Wright (10 Jur. 11; 15 Law Journ., N. S., Q. B., 70) was an action of trespass, and the declaration alleged, that the defendant, heretofore, &c., assaulted the plaintiff, and then, with great force, &c., seized and laid hold of him, &c. The defendant pleaded several pleas of justification; to which the plaintiff replied, de injuriâ, and also new assigned, that he issued his writ, and brought his action, not only for the trespasses in the pleas mentioned, and therein attempted to be justified, but also, that the defendant, on other and different occasions, &c., assaulted him, &c.; to which there was a special demurrer and joinder, it being alleged in support of it, that there was but one assault laid in the declaration, and the new assignment was a departure from it, as enlarging it, and making it include several. And of this opinion was the court, shewing, that, where the trespass is not stated to be continued, as in Loweth v. Smith (12 Mee. & W. 582) and Worth v. Terrington, (13 Mee. & W. 781), or laid at divers times, the new assignment is improper. The case of Loweth v. Smith is too long to be noticed here; but, upon this point, it well deserves perusal.

Hatchett, (ante, 182; 15 Law Journ., N. S., Q. B., 68), which differs from the others, in being an action of trover, in which kind of action new assignments have not been usual under any circumstances. It was an action of trover for, amongst other things, ten pieces of timber; to which the defendant pleaded generally, that the articles mentioned in the declaration were obstructing a navigable river, and that he removed them. To this the plaintiff replied, de injuriâ, and also new assigned, that he was possessed of five pieces of timber different from those mentioned in the plea, and that he brought his action for converting those, as well as the pieces of timber mentioned in the plea. Upon demurrer for duplicity, it was contended, for the defendant, that, as the plea was to the whole of the count generally, it covered all that was stated in it, and that the plaintiff could not new assign. But, said the court, "We are, however, of opinion, that the plaintiff in this case was entitled both to traverse and to new assign. The number of pieces of timber is alleged generally in the declaration; and the plaintiff is not bound by the exact number, but is at liberty to prove less. The plea is as general as the count, and apparently answers it. The allegation of number in the declaration is a divisible allegation, and the plea, though apparently answering the whole, may, in truth, only answer a part; and if that were so in fact, and the defendant had a justification as to some of the pieces of wood, but none as to the others, the plaintiff must new assign as to those to which the justification does not apply; for, if he merely take issue upon the plea, he will be taken to admit that the justification applies to all that is alleged in the declaration. Bowen v. Jenkin (6 Adol. & Ell. 911) decides this expressly. The cases upon the subject will be found collected and commented on in the notes to the case of Greene v. Jones, (1 Saund. 298, 300), and fully warrant the course which has been pursued by the plaintiff; and the later cases are in accordance with those authorities. Our judgment, therefore, in this case, is for the plaintiff."

GRANT'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, composed anew, and according to all the existing Operative Orders of Court, including the last of 9th May, 1845.

A. Maxwell & Son, 32, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn; H. Sweet, 1 and 3, Chancery-lane; and V. and R. Stevens & G. S. Norton, 26 and 28, Bell-yard, Lincoln's Inn.

In six very thick octavo Volumes, price 61. 10s. in strong cloth bds. BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE AND PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Essex District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of those Statutes the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superseding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fullness of the Marginal Notes.

PROSPECTUS.

This Society is now completely registered, and prepared to transact all the usual business of Life Assurance.

It is based upon a principle which will combine the benefits of Mutual Assurance with the guarantee of a Subscribed Capital of ONE MILLION STERLING.

Whilst perfect Security is thus given, the number and character of the Shareholders (consisting of nearly 400 Members of the Legal Profession) will command a large amount of business, and consequent advantages will arise to the Assured.

Tables of Premiums have been prepared expressly for this Office, by F. G. P. NIXSON, Esq., F.L.S., calculated on the nearest approximation to the real law of mortality.

These Tables will be found to afford peculiar encouragement to the Assurance of Young Lives. They embrace participating and non-participating Scales.

In the participating Class, the Assured will be entitled to have four-fifths of the Profits divided amongst them periodically, either by way of Addition to the Amount assured, or in Diminution of Premium, as the Parties may elect. No deduction will be made from such Profits for Interest of Capital, or for a Guarantee Fund.

The Premiums may be paid half-yearly or annually, or by a single Payment.

Assurances may be effected through any respectable Solicitor, or by writing to the Secretary.

The Directors meet on Thursdays at 2 o'clock; but Assurances may be effected on any day, by applying, between the hours of 10 and 4, at the Office of the Society, where Prospectuses and all other requisite information may be obtained.

for inquiry being shewn, for the administration of the trust property confided to their care.

In another part of this appeal we find the following passage:—

"Now, it is well known, that hitherto and at this moment, all, or the chief of the large charitable foundations and institutions in this kingdom, are managed by gentlemen of station, ability, and independence, who gratuitously devote their time and talents, and valuable habits of business, to the care and most economic and beneficial disposition of the charity funds, and use their influence in extending them and promoting their increase. The chief of the petitions presented last sessions against the bill came from bodies composed of gentlemen of this description: gentlemen, who were not the mere administrators of funds created centuries ago, and never since increased or increasing,—the trustees of old deposits merely, dropt into a dead letter,—but gentlemen who had themselves been large contributors to the charity under their management, themselves, in some instances, the very source of it; themselves the persons from whom the whole, or a very large proportion, of the charitable annual income arose and continued to arise. Well might bodies composed of such men complain, that they needed no inquisitors to catechise and control them in the disposition of their funds; well might they grudge to mulct such funds with a percentage to pay for the performance of this superfluous, obnoxious, and impertinent duty."

One would imagine, from these passages, that there was no such thing as a charity fund of large amount left unadministered, either from neglect or want of power in the trustees; and that the smaller charities of this kingdom were of inconsiderable amount. Have the writers of this appeal never heard of cases such as Attorney-General v. The Ironmongers' Company (10 Cl. & Fin. 908) or Attorney-General v. Gibson, (2 Beav. 317, n. (a)), where absolutely nothing was done with immense trust funds, and they were allowed to accumulate for years, until the interference of the Court of Chancery was brought to bear upon the administration of the charity? Or, on the other hand, have these writers forgotten the statement made last year, upon good authority, by the Lord Chancellor, that there are in this country 13,000 charities with an income of less than 5*l.* a year, 18,000 with an income of less than 10*l.*, and 21,000 with an income of less than 20*l.* a year?

No doubt, there are many modern charities, which are, as stated in the appeal, managed, and well managed, by gentlemen of the highest character,—themselves personally large donors or contributors. But there is not, on the other hand, a shadow of doubt, that there are many charities of great importance, both ancient and modern, which are either not managed at all, or grossly mismanaged; and that there are myriads of the smaller charities, which have been for generations a dead letter, (so far as carrying out the objects of the original trusts is concerned), and are likely to remain so, unless a jurisdiction such as that contemplated by the Charitable Trusts Bill is created. Such a jurisdiction will be of course regulated by the rules that govern all judicial bodies, and will be dangerous or harassing only in cases where the trustees of a charity have given ground for imputing to them neglect or mismanagement.

The Charitable Trusts Bill may be very irritating to the love of consequence of persons who disguise to themselves their true character of trustees, under the pleasant title of "managers" of charities, and are fond of imagining, that, as managers, it is very impertinent in the law to catechise and control them. But we apprehend, that, to the great body of charitable cœtus que trustent, and to those managers of charities who are not deluded into the notion that they are, or ought to be, irresponsible persons, the matter will appear in a different light: to the former, the provisions of the act will appear to afford protection; to the latter, the indemnity consequent upon judicial inquiry and sanction.

Rebibo.

A Treatise on the Law relating to Patent Privileges, &c.
By WILLIAM HINDMARCH, Esq., Barrister.

[Stevens & Norton. 1846.]

There is a singular disproportion between the extent of the business in matters of patents for inventions, and the number of text-books published on the subject. The amount of business brought before the lawyer in or out of court is not extensive, as may be well supposed, if our readers will bear in mind, that, though there are, upon an average, probably not less than 200 patents taken out every year, not one quarter of the inventions comprised in them ever comes into practice, and of that quarter probably not one-tenth is of sufficient importance to warrant or to produce any transactions requiring the attention of lawyers. Of probably nine-tenths of all the patents taken out, it may be asserted that their passage through the agent's office is their whole active existence; that the only business they generate is the business attending the suing out of the patent, and the preparation of the necessary specification and drawings, (a business almost entirely transacted by patent agents, and gentlemen practising exclusively as specification draftsmen); and that, when the specifications reach the office where they are inrolled, they have reached their last and long home, where, in the undisturbed repose of the official presses, they slumber on for their fourteen years of legal existence. As evidence of the small amount of forensic business in patents, we may mention, that, in the book now before us, the latest and most elaborate on the subject, and which, we think, we may venture to say of our own knowledge, as having paid much attention to the law of patents, contains pretty well all the cases that are to be found in the books, not more than about 450 cases are cited—a number which, by its smallness, shews how very little there is of litigation in the matter of patents, and, consequently, how small must be the number of lawyers, either counsel or solicitors, actively engaged in matters of business turning upon them. Nevertheless, since no man, either counsel or solicitor, knows when he may be called upon to advise upon patents, or prepare instruments connected with them, or to conduct litigation concerning them; moreover, as regards the bar, since any member of it may be, and we presume every member of it expects to be, the particular barrister, on whom, at some day, the duty of adjudicating, as Attorney or Solicitor-General, upon the claims of inventors to the favour of the Crown, will devolve, there appears to be a legal appetite for books on the law of patents, greatly disproportionate to the amount of general business arising out of that law; at least, we may so judge from the number of text-books that have been published on the subject. First, there is Hand's Practice; then Davies' Patent Cases; then Godson on Patents; then Holroyd on Patents; then a second edition of Godson on Patents; then a very useful little book, (by a gentleman not in the law, but well known as a scientific adviser of patentees), Carpmal on Patents; then Drewry on the Patent Law Amendment Act; then Webster on Patents; then an elaborate essay on the subject in the 7th volume of the last edition of Jarman's Conveyancing; then Webster's Patent Cases; and, lastly, the present work. If we compare this array of learned productions on the law of patents, with the list of text-books in any extensive branch of the law, as, for instance, on the law and practice of bankruptcy, of which there are, we believe, but three, viz. Lord Henley's, Mr. Archbold's, and Montague and Ayrton's, the contrast is, to say the least, singular. The explanation by Mr. Hindmarch, in that prefatory justification in which authors are used to indulge, of his reasons for adding to the stock, is also singular. He says, it was with the view of supplying the acknowledged want of such a treatise, that he commenced his work; but, in a note, he adds, that "this is not intended as any disparagement of the many useful works on patent law which have been published."

How, with no less than eight existing text-books on this little subject, some of them of goodly bulk, there could be an acknowledged want of a treatise, unless the existing ones were individually insufficient, and, therefore, disparageable, we must leave Mr. Hindmarch to settle; and, difficult as the subject is, with which he has most vigorously and ably dealt in the book before us, we think he will find, that, to reconcile the antagonistic assertions suggested by his modesty in his preface, will present to him a still more intractable difficulty.

We do not like these mock-modest prefaces. If a learned lawyer thinks there is a space open, wherein to insert a treatise, he has a right to do so. He would not attempt it, and still less would his publisher abet him in the attempt, unless he bona fide thought the existing books, on some grounds, open to objection. Let him, under such circumstances, write the best book he can; and in his preface, let him either say nothing at all about other works, or say at once that which is at the very root of his own effort, that he thinks the existing works, for some reason or other, not sufficiently good, and, therefore, he has tried to do better.

A statement such as that in Mr. Hindmarch's preface is calculated to mislead the reader, who will not anticipate accuracy and sound reasoning in the body of a book, the author of which can set out with so palpable a contradiction, without appearing to be conscious that it is one. The reader, however, who suffers himself to be thus prejudiced, on sitting down to peruse Mr. Hindmarch's treatise, will find that he has been mistaken; that the preface was merely a piece of parade; and that the book is a very good one in all respects.

The law of patents is one of peculiar difficulty. Fully to understand its application, requires not only the ordinary knowledge and the ordinary legal judgment of an accomplished lawyer, but a very considerable amount of general scientific knowledge, or, at least, that quickness and sharpness of apprehension, that accuracy of judgment, and, above all, that aptitude for perceiving distinctions in matters of science, which pre-suppose a mind imbued with general knowledge, and rendered acute and penetrating by practice and much thought. The subject-matters to which the law of patents has to be applied are so various; the distinctive characters of several inventions are separated by lines and characteristics so fine; the difficulty of separating the practical invention from the abstract theory in matters of invention is so great; that the wonder is not that there should be found occasional obscurity and occasional contradiction in the decisions upon the law of patents, but that there should be so much of uniformity, so much of sound and practical sense. And the only explanation of the fact, that the law of patents is, as a whole, so uniform and consistent as it is, is to be found in the high education, the sound sense, and catholic knowledge which, whatever may be said by those who think that to sneer at a lawyer is a proof of their own wit and wisdom, are the characteristics of the judges and bar of this country.

The law relating to exclusive privileges granted by letters-patent is founded partly on the common law and partly on statutory law.

At common law the Crown could, by its prerogative, grant an exclusive privilege to a subject for the exercise of a new invention, whether it were the invention of his own brain, or a new art imported by him from abroad; and many old cases are cited by Mr. Hindmarch to prove this, (see chap. 2, pp. 7 et seq.) Indeed, in those early periods of the history of this country, when mechanical inventions began to play their part in the trade of the country, our own people were too ill informed in general to be themselves inventors; and nearly all the early cases upon letters-patent for inventions in the useful arts, turn upon importations of new arts from abroad: hence, no doubt, the celebrated resolution in Edgberry v. Stephens, (7 Salk. 467), that, if an invention be new in England, a patent may be granted, though the thing was practised beyond sea before,—a construction of the language of the Statute of Monopolies which the natural sense of the word "inventor" would hardly justify, and which is explicable only by reference to the fact, that, at the time when the Statute of Monopolies was passed, there was scarcely such a thing known in England as indigenous invention; and, therefore, to have excluded from the benefit of the statute, the discoverers and importers of foreign inventions, would have been to exclude the only sort of discoverers that the nation knew. Since the Statute of Monopolies, the law has become gradually consolidated, passing through two different stages: first, one of extreme hostility generally to patent privileges, founded on the exaggerated national and judicial horror of monopolies; and, secondly, one of extreme leaning towards the support of patent privileges, founded upon an equally exaggerated opinion of the immense value of inventors as public benefactors. The law is just emerging from this second state into one in which neither the word "monopoly" nor the word "invention" exerts any magical and delusive influence, and in which it is becoming daily more a principle practically acted upon, that a patent is a contract between the inventor and the public, in which each finds a benefit, and in respect to which the business of the law is, to see that the substantial intention of the parties is carried into effect.

The fundamental principle of a grant of letters-patent for the exclusive use of an invention is, that the inventor, representing to the Crown, and establishing to its satisfaction, a prima facie case, that he has invented or imported some manufacture new in these realms, entitles himself not of right, but as of grace, or, according to the modern understanding, puts himself in a position to bargain with the Crown, representing the public, to obtain a grant of an exclusive right of using and vending the new manufacture for fourteen years, provided it is a manufacture,—provided it is a new manufacture,—provided he is the real inventor or first importer,—and provided he also, by a suitable instrument, called technically the specification, teaches the real grantor, the public, how to use the new manufacture at the end of the term of the grant, as well as he (the patentee) himself knows how to use it. If, on any of these points, the patentee does not keep faith with the Crown, i. e. the public, the consideration of the grant fails, and with it goes the grant itself.

Hence the rules relating to the title or denomination of an invention, inserted by the petitioner for a patent in the petition, in which he represents to the Crown what it is that he has invented. If A., for instance, represents that he has invented improvements in the machinery by which the movements of the heddles of a loom are regulated, and, in fact, he has invented some new mode of connecting the heddles with the harness*, he is obviously not stating to the Crown, the real consideration on which he grounds his application. It may be, that the Crown, i. e. the public, is well apprised that it could obtain from B., or from abroad or otherwise, without the aid of the applicant, and without giving any exclusive privilege, the invention of the new mode of connecting the heddles with the harness, and would never have agreed to give to the applicant an exclusive right for that invention, if it had been informed that the discovery of that was the consideration offered.

From the terms of the contract, also, flow the inquiries that have been made into the true construction of the Statute of Monopolies. The Crown has no authority, since the statute, to grant an exclusive privilege, except for a new manufacture. Hence have arisen the discussions relating to the meaning of the term "manufacture,"—discussions which have terminated in the general doctrine, that a manufacture, to be within the statute, must be, in some sense, the embodying of a principle; that is, the mere discovery of a truth in science will not satisfy the words of the statute; but the discovery must be in itself a substantive thing, or else it must be some mode of dealing with matter, so as to produce or act upon some substantive thing. Unless this character of substantiality is impressed upon an invention, it is not an invention of a manufacture, within the meaning of the statute.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

April 23.—The court will, on Monday next, the 27th instant, deliver judgment in the following cases:—

Solomon v. Lawson.—Griffiths v. Lewis.
 Alfred v. Farlow.—Reg. v. Douglas.

In Stuart v. Wilkinson, in the New Trial Paper, at the commencement of the argument, the court suggested that a stet process would be a proper end of the cause; and Lord Denman, C. J., said, "It is thought by many, that, if a verdict is set aside because the jury have done wrong, it must be upon payment of costs; but that practice has been long discontinued in this court, and I believe that it will shortly be discontinued in the other courts. In setting aside a verdict, this court looks to the nature of the inquiry and the other circumstances, and exercise their discretion on the question of costs."

The rule in Stuart v. Wilkinson was argued and made absolute.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint Alexander Stewart, Esq., to be Master of the Rolls for the province of Nova Scotia.

MASTER IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed Charles Marsh Lee, of New Sarum, in the county of Wiltshire, Gent., to be a Master Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery.

* For our readers uninitiated in manufactures, we will explain, that the heddles are certain levers, one set of ends of which is connected with the warp of a loom by strings termed harness, and the other set of ends with machinery of various kinds, by which they are moved up and down at stated intervals, in order to separate the threads of the warp at such intervals as are required for throwing the weft across and between them.

LONDON, MAY 2, 1846.

By the 24 Geo. 2, c. 44, it is enacted, that no writ shall be sued out against, nor any copy of any process at the suit of a subject shall be served on, any justice of the peace, for anything by him done in the execution of his office, until notice in writing of such intended writ or process shall have been delivered to him, or left at the usual place of his abode, by the attorney or agent for the party who intends to sue, or cause the same to be sued out or served at least one calendar month before the suing out or serving the same; in which notice shall be clearly and explicitly contained the cause of action which such party hath or claimeth to have against such justice of the peace. And by the 3rd and 5th sections the plaintiff is not to recover any verdict in case the action shall be grounded on an act of the defendant as justice of the peace, unless it is proved on the trial that the notice was given; and no evidence is to be given by the plaintiff upon the trial of any cause of action except such as is contained in the notice. By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 37, s. 4, the law is rendered uniform as to these notices of action, and they are required in all cases to be given one calendar month at least before the action is commenced.

What is a sufficient notice under the above provision is frequently a question of great nicety, and it has often happened, that persons, having a good ground of complaint against magistrates, have been deprived of redress by a mistake in the notice, and it being impossible, in consequence of the time for bringing the action being limited, to serve a fresh notice. There are, however, some cases of modern date, by an examination of which we may now be able to obtain a tolerably safe guide for the future. The first and most frequently quoted of these is Martins v. Upcher, reported in 3 Q. B. 862, in which the notice was in the following form:

—"For that you, on the 5th day of October, A. D. 1840, with force and arms, caused an assault to be made on the said Martin Martins, and then caused him to be apprehended, seized, and laid hold of, and to be forced, and compelled to go as a prisoner and in custody, in, through, and along divers public highways, to a certain dwelling-house, and there caused him to be imprisoned and detained in prison for a long time, to wit, for twelve hours then next following, at the expiration of which time you again forced and compelled the said Martin Martins to go as a prisoner and in custody, from and out of the said dwelling-house, into, through, and along divers other public highways, to a prison and house of correction, and to be there imprisoned, kept, and detained in prison there for a long time, to wit, for three months then next following, whereby" &c. It will be observed, that, in the above notice, the place at which the trespass was committed is nowhere specified; and upon this objection being taken to it at the trial, the plaintiff was nonsuited: and the court, in banc afterwards held the nonsuit to be right. "This appears," said Lord Denman, C. J., "to be the first case on which a decision on the point now before us has been called for in Westminster Hall. An inference might be suggested from the point not having been raised in banc before; but that, I think, would not be safe. Indeed, it is not certain that the question may not have arisen, but have remained unnoticed in the reports, because the actual decisions have been upon other points. I decide, however, on the language of the act, which requires that the causes of action 'shall be clearly and explicitly contained' in the notice. Unless both time and place be inserted, the cause is not clearly and explicitly contained."

The next case was Breese v. Jordein, (4 Q. B. 585), in which the notice ran thus: "You having, ~~equ~~ about the 27th day of May now last past, caused Daniel Breese, of Pwllhele, in the county of Carnarvon, gentleman, to be apprehended and detained in custody, without any reasonable or probable cause whatsoever, for the space of three hours then next following, and having afterwards caused him to be committed to a certain common gaol or prison, called the Compter, in the city of London, and to be there imprisoned, and kept and detained in prison there, without any reasonable or probable cause whatsoever, for a further space of time, to wit, for the space of twelve hours next following, I do, therefore, as the attorney of and for the said Daniel Breese in this behalf, hereby give you and each of you notice," &c. In this notice it will be seen that the place of apprehension and detainer on the 27th of May is not stated; and though the place of the imprisonment, in the Compter, is stated, it is not stated when that was. "Having afterwards" is too indefinite, and may mean on the 27th, or some other day. For this omission the notice was held bad, on the authority of Martins v. Upcher.

Lastly, in Jacklin v. Fytche, (14 Mee. & W. 381), the notice was in the following words:—"For that you, on the 10th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1844, with force and arms, caused an assault to be made upon me, and then caused me to be beaten, seized, and laid hold of, and to be forced and compelled to go into, along, and through divers public streets and roads to a certain prison, to wit, at Louth, in the said parts, and to be unlawfully imprisoned, and kept and detained in prison there, in a dark and unwholesome place there, without any reasonable or justifiable cause whatever, for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of forty days then next following, contrary to the laws and customs of this realm, and against the will of me the said William Jacklin." At the trial, (and this it will be important to bear in mind), the only evidence given was, that the plaintiff was delivered into the custody of the gaoler of the house of correction at Louth, upon a warrant of commitment for two calendar months to hard labour, signed by the defendants, under the Master and Servant Act, 4 Geo. 4, c. 34, which was admitted to be invalid. And it was objected, for the defendants, that the notice of action was insufficient, inasmuch as no place was alleged with respect to the assault and original imprisonment. Upon the question being brought before the court, on a motion to enter a nonsuit, they decided, that, as far as regarded the imprisonment at Louth, the trespass was properly described, and that being the only part proved, the notice was sufficient. The first part of the notice was apparently bad, according to Martins v. Upcher, as the place where the assault was committed was not expressly stated. It may still, however, admit of doubt, whether, even as to the assault, the notice was not good; and the remark of Rolfe, B., in his judgment, deserves attention. He says, "If the case of Martins v. Upcher be admitted to be good law, it does not necessarily follow, that the first part of this notice is bad, because there no place was mentioned; it was left in this respect in perfect ambiguity. Here, I should say that it is the description of one continued act, concluding with the imprisonment at Louth. I doubt very much, therefore, whether even that part of the statement is not sufficient." And Baron Parke says he is very much disposed to concur in the above opinion.

These cases shew the necessity of carefully inserting, in such notices as the above, the time and place at which every act of trespass complained of is committed. We say every act, because, notwithstanding the judgment quoted above, we should not advise any one to rely upon a notice like that in Jacklin v. Fytche.

Whether any substantial good is obtained by requiring such notices, may well be questioned. To us it appears that the whole law as to actions against magistrates requires revision. If they are to be protected at all when they have acted fairly and bona fide, it ought to be by some more efficient means than exist at present; and, if they deserve no protection, a plaintiff ought not to be hampered by having to go through more formal proceedings than in other cases.

A Treatise on the Law relating to Patent Privileges, &c.

[Sevens & Norton. 1846.]

It is, of course, well known to those whose practice has led them to the consideration of the law of patents, and it will be readily imagined by others, that, on such questions as whether the designation of an invention contained in the petition for a patent, is a correct designation; or what is a manufacture within the meaning of the statute; distinctions of the finest and most technical kind have been taken, and that the authorities are numerous, and require the greatest care in considering them. This part of the subject Mr. Hindmarch has discussed very ably in the 10th chapter of his work, treating of the grant and its construction, (title "Of the Recital," p. 40), and in the first title of the 5th chapter, treating of the nature of the art. (P. 77). In the latter chapter he has rendered an acceptable service to the Profession, by referring (for the purpose of illustrating the doctrine, that the Statute of Monopolies did not create any new rights as to the granting of letters-patent) to several old authorities, which have not been usually cited in text-books on the law of patents, (see, in particular, pp. 81, 82, 83), and which assist materially in throwing light upon the construction of the statute.

On the difficult and much debated question, to what extent or in what sense a principle may be the subject of a patent, Mr. Hindmarch's observations appear to us very pertinent and instructive:—

"It is clear," he says, (p. 90), "that first principles, such as the fundamental laws of mechanics, chemistry, or any other science, cannot be made the subject of a patent privilege. First principles are capable of an endless variety of uses or applications, and they are the common property of all men, who are at liberty to make any use of them they may think fit, or apply them in any manner their ingenuity may suggest, provided they do not attempt to appropriate to themselves exclusively any ground pre-occupied by any other person. No principle or primary law of science can of itself, and apart from the practical application of it, be capable of producing any vendible article of manufacture; and, therefore, unless a person who discovers such a principle or law makes some practical use of it, so as to produce some article which the public requires and will purchase, he cannot give the public the consideration which the law requires to be given for the grant of a sole privilege. The object in law

'was not to reward mere speculative discovery, but to encourage industry, and to procure for the public the benefit of new manufactures.

"But every art or invention must adopt principle, or include the application of it to some extent, and the principle of an invention thus becomes an essential part of it; indeed, any new art which is made the subject of a grant by the Crown, can only be some new practical application of principles or laws which has been invented by the patentee for the purpose of producing articles of manufacture useful to the public.

"The word 'principle' is frequently used in such phrases as 'principle of the invention,' to designate some peculiar mode or method of constructing anything according to a particular invention. In this sense, a principle signifies the particular practical application of some principle or principles for the purposes of an invention, which is, properly speaking, an art. Thus, the principle of an invention of a new machine signifies the peculiar art by means of which the new machine is constructed. There is nothing improper in this use of the word 'principle,' and when it is used, that is, when it is used to designate the peculiar mode of constructing anything according to an invention, it is clearly an art which may be made the subject of a patent privilege."

The different matters relating to the specification, the prolongation of letters-patent, alterations and disclaimers, &c., are all very fully discussed by Mr. Hindmarch, and, as we have already observed, he has, to the best of our knowledge, suffered no case of any importance to escape his notice. In the chapter on the specification, he has adopted the convenient plan of stating a series of propositions as general rules, illustrating each by a series of authorities on which it is based. Thus:—"The patentee," he lays down as the first rule, "must, in his specification, describe the invention which is comprised in his patent, and not any other. And if it appears that there is any variance, or that the invention as described in the specification is not precisely similar to that mentioned in the patent, the patent will be void." This position the author supports by referring to Res v. Wheeler (2 B. & Ald. 345) and Campion v. Kenyon, (6 B. Moore, 82). The second is, "that the patentee must, in his specification, make a full disclosure of the nature of his invention, and of the manner in which it is to be performed." And, on this, reference is made to Res v. Arkwright, (Dav. Pat. Cas. 61); Turner v. Winter, (Dav. Pat. Cas. 151); Lewis v. Marling, 10 B. & C. 22, and other cases. And so on, the author proceeds to lay down twenty-four general rules for the guidance of those who have to frame specifications. It would have been convenient to the reader, if the general propositions had been printed as a separate series at the bottom of the pages in which they occur, in the manner adopted by Mr. Butler, in the 9th edition of Fearne's Contingent Remainders.

Our time and space prevent us from fully analysing the whole of Mr. Hindmarch's treatise. Suffice it to say, that he appears to have taken the utmost pains to omit nothing that could be useful to the professional reader; that, in particular, he is very full upon the subject of proceedings at law and in equity in respect to the attack or protection of patent rights, and that he concludes his volume by a copious collection of forms and precedents, useful in practice.

In the chapter on proceedings in equity, we find some statements, with regard to applications for injunctions, which appear to us calculated, to some extent, to mislead. The author lays it down, on the authority of Hill v. Thompson (3 Mer. 626) and Sturt v. Delarue (5 Russ. 322), that, whenever an interlocutory application for an injunction to restrain infringement of a patent is made, whether it be ex parte or upon notice, it must be supported by an affidavit of the applicant's belief, that he is, at the time of swearing it, the true and first inventor. This rule is undoubtedly one proper to be observed by a prudent plaintiff before making his application; but, if it be meant that it would be equally safe in all cases for the defendant to rely upon the objection to a motion for an injunction, that the plaintiff has not filed such an affidavit, then we conceive it doubtful whether the doctrine can be considered so settled. Hill v. Thompson came on upon a motion to dissolve an injunction which had been obtained ex parte, upon an affidavit generally swearing to the applicant's belief that he was the inventor of the improvements mentioned in the specification; and Lord Eldon's observations were distinctly and exclusively pointed at ex parte applications: he said, "When, in future, an injunction is applied for ex parte, on the ground of violation of a right to an invention secured by patent, it must be understood that it is incumbent on the party making the application to swear, at the time of making it, as to his belief that he is the inventor. For although, when he obtained his patent, he might very honestly have sworn as to his belief of such being the fact, yet circumstances might have subsequently intervened, or information been communicated, sufficient to convince him that it was not his own original invention, and that he was under a mistake when he made his previous declaration to that effect."

But Lord Eldon did not say, and, we apprehend, never could have meant to say, that such an affidavit is necessary where a motion is made for an injunction upon notice. When a party alleging himself to be a patentee, applies ex parte for an injunction, he applies, upon the assertion of a legal title which is not in him unless he fills a certain character, for an order, which, if he have not such legal title, would interfere with the defendant's common-law right. It is, therefore, a perfectly rational condition to impose upon him, that, before he asks the court to run the risk of doing such an injustice to the defendant, he shall go beyond the mere production of such his apparent title, and at least pledge his own belief that his title is valid; that is, shall produce to the court the only evidence of title that the ex parte nature of the proceedings permits. But, when he moves upon notice, the production and proof of the grant are of themselves proof of the applicant's title, until it is denied by the defendant's evidence.

Suppose the case of a motion for an injunction, and the plaintiff producing and proving the grant. The defendant meets the motion, neither admitting nor denying the validity of the legal title, but resting his defence merely on the fact of no infringement. Will it be contended that the court would put the plaintiff to prove, by affidavit, his belief that he is the inventor? Suppose, on the other hand, the defendant denies that the plaintiff is the true inventor. The plaintiff must then, by affidavit or otherwise, establish the fact that he is the true inventor, not because such evidence is prima facie necessary ultra the proof afforded by the grant itself, but because the fact which the grant itself presumes, is denied; and the court would be bound to believe the evidence of the defendant, if it is not contradicted. We conceive that it is not the belief of the patentee that he is the inventor, that is necessary at all to support his patent. The plaintiff's affidavit of belief is no more than evidence of a fact—the fact that he is the inventor; liable, like any other piece of evidence, to be strengthened or weakened, or altogether rebutted, by other evidence; and the ground for requiring it on an ex parte motion, viz. the circumstance of its being the best evidence then accessible, and the court being unprotected except by such evidence, fails totally upon a motion made on notice, when the defendant can deny the plaintiff's title, and the court can hear all the evidence that both parties shall think fit to offer upon the question, whether the plaintiff is the true inventor or not. A strong proof that the plaintiff's belief is immaterial, except as evidence of the fact, is, that, if the motion is made upon notice after answer, no affidavit, at least as to title, could be read against the answer, but the injunction must stand or fall upon the answer; which shews that the affidavit is not material, when the court has such other evidence to proceed upon, as the nature of the proceeding permits to be produced.

Sturtz v. De la Rue (5 Russ. 322) was also a motion to dissolve an ex parte injunction. The argument for costs in that case had reference to the injunction that had been obtained, that is, an ex parte injunction; and though the Lord Chancellor, in his judgment, does not in terms refer to an ex parte injunction, but says an injunction generally, yet, as he was dealing with an ex parte injunction, there can be no question, that, whatever might have been the opinion given by him upon the point, if it had arisen, he was, in Sturtz v. De la Rue, not considering it, but thinking and speaking only of an ex parte injunction. Neilson v. Thompson, cited by Mr. Hindmarch, (p. 334), is, so far as it goes, an authority that the doctrine of Hill v. Thompson does not apply to a motion made upon notice. We should conclude, from the authorities and upon the reason of the thing, that, though it will always be prudent to file an affidavit as to the belief of the inventor, before moving for an injunction, as well upon notice as ex parte, it is very doubtful whether a defendant could successfully resist a motion made on notice, on no other ground than the absence of such an affidavit.

To return to Mr. Hindmarch's work, we should particularly recommend to the perusal of solicitors the chapter on the practice in obtaining patents and in proceeding under Lord Brougham's act, (pp. 503 et seq.), which is clearly and fully set forth; and with this observation we shall now conclude our notice of this book, pronouncing it a useful addition to the libraries of those lawyers who have, or desire to have, anything to do with patents.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—I should have written to you a fortnight since, had I not thought that J. W. would probably expose some of the inaccuracies of G. S., and, therefore, waited, in order to see J. W.'s remarks, before I offered any of my own. It seems, however, that I have waited in vain; and I now trust you will permit me, albeit at the eleventh hour, to avail myself of your columns, in order to expose the gross inaccuracies and misrepresentations of G. S.

The second paragraph of G. S. contains the following words:—"When J. W. expounds the rules of the common law, and their application to particular cases, no one can desire a sounder or more perspicuous guide," &c. In his very next paragraph he proceeds, "J. W. may have proved, for aught I know, that, at the common law," &c. And, again, a little further on, "I fully admit all that is expressed and implied by J. W.'s authorities." (Ante, p. 132).

Now, it seems to me that the second of these quotations is not exactly consistent with the first and third. Has G. S., I would ask, carefully read and followed J. W.'s arguments, and the authorities on which they are based? Unless he has done so, he should not have presumed to term him a sound and perspicuous guide, or to declare that he admits all that is "expressed and implied by his authorities." On the other hand, if he has done so, he must surely be prepared to say, whether, in his opinion, J. W. has, or has not, proved the points in question; and the words "for aught I know," &c. seem, in such case, utterly out of place.

On a former occasion I remarked, that J. W., in considering the case of estates tail before that of estates in fee simple, adopted an illogical and unnatural arrangement; and I do not see the least reason to alter the opinion then expressed of J. W.'s merits as a guide in such investigations, in consequence of any of the naked assertions of G. S., who has not condescended to support his views on this subject by any arguments.

The following passage, in addition to the misrepresentation it contains, seems to shew that G. S. has fallen into a similar error:—"But I say that the case of a fee simple was entirely different, and that J. W.'s position, (echoed by J. C. C.), that, if the heir of a person had been discovered for the purposes of an estate tail, the same individual would also be heir of the same person for the purposes of the descent of an estate in fee simple, is quite erroneous; the coincidence is always accidental. He will not deny this on a case being put," &c. (Ante, p. 132). This passage commences by a gross misrepresentation. J. C. C. nowhere echoes J. W.'s position. His (J. C. C.'s) words (ante, p. 113) are, "We deny that J. W. has proved his position as to the course of a descent tail, and, therefore, need not say more as to his inferences therefrom." But, although we never echoed J. W.'s position, (to adopt the most incongruous metaphor of G. S.), we are not prepared to admit that it is so erroneous as he asserts. We deny that the coincidence was, as he tells us, always accidental, and submit, that, had he not followed the illogical order of investigation adopted by J. W., he would have seen that a descent in fee tail was merely a descent in fee simple narrowed by the Statute de Donis, and, therefore, must not, by "accident," but as a necessary consequence, have coincided whenever the descent of a fee simple kept within the stricter bounds created by that statute for a descent in fee tail general.

The case put by G. S. is that of a fee tail male, to which more restricted species of the genus fee tail the position of J. W. did not extend; but probably G. S. would argue, that, because every fee tail male is a fee tail, it follows that every fee tail is a fee tail male; if not, it is impossible to guess how he means the case he puts to apply.

G. S. proceeds to notice some of the anomalies incident to an estate in fee tail, and the differences which distinguish it from an estate in fee simple. I am still inclined to think that the explanation of these difficulties suggested in my former letter is the correct one; nor am I prepared to allow that the opinion of the editor of Bythewood (vol. 1, p. 139) is erroneous. I fully see the force of the arguments of G. S. on this subject, but cannot admit them to be conclusive; on the contrary, I am still inclined to think, that, in the case supposed, the death of a coparcener before entry under the old law, it would be more correct to say, that a reiterated or successive descent would have taken place, than to say, that, until entry, the inheritance remains vacant. Can the inheritance, I would ask, ever be vacant, even for a moment? and does not the law cast it on the heir for the time being immediately on the death of the ancestor, or other party dying entitled? It is true, that the heir, on whom the inheritance is so cast, may neglect to improve his legal seisin into such an estate as would constitute him a fresh root of descent; but can his so neglecting to perfect his inchoate right to become such root, make the descent cast upon him by act of law any the less a descent? If he so neglect to make himself a root of descent, two successive heirs, no doubt, will both claim in the same right, i. e. each as heir (pro tanto) for the time being to their common ancestor, and may, therefore, constitute but one degree for some purposes; but they are not the less two successive heirs, and must, therefore, we maintain, inherit by virtue of two successive descents.

It is not possible to go fully into this question here; but I may remark, that it seems clear, that successive descents of a reversion were possible under the old law, although each successive heir was obliged to make himself heir to the creator of the reversion. The estate of such successive heirs, although seisin was impossible, admitted (by the creation of a fresh reversion, or by other alienation) of being improved into such an estate as constituted any heir so improving it a root of descent; and, therefore, as each successive heir might have exercised such ownership, had he chosen, the law would not allow creditors' claims to be in all cases defeated by the heir of a reversion having neglected so to do. It seems but fair, that the law should regard every deceased person's estate as assets for the benefit of creditors, to the full extent to which the deceased owner might in his lifetime have alienated it; and we think G. S. lays too much stress on the fact of an estate being assets, &c. It is clear, that the fact of an estate of inheritance being assets for the benefit of a deceased person's creditors, does not, as he seems to assert, (ante, p. 133), necessarily prove that the descent thereof would devolve on his heirs as such, or, in other words, that he was an actual root of descent thereof. It would be nearer the truth to say, that it proves that he had it in his power to become such root, had he taken proper steps to do so; but I do not pretend to lay this down as an invariable rule.

"Quot heredes tot descensus" would be a brief statement of my view of the subject, against which the case of several coparceners would not militate, for they constitute between them only one single composite heir. And I should define a descent to be, that momentary change of ownership which takes place when any estate of inheritance is set in motion by the death of the person last entitled thereto. If this be not so, a descent is not the thing we have always deemed it. We have good authority for asserting, that the "descensus" to the dead is "facilis;" we had always deemed the "descensus" from the dead equally so. If, however, G. S. be right, we must look for some less classical epithet, and admit that the laws of legal gravitation are very tolerant of temporary suspension. But this, perhaps, ought not to surprise us, as no fact is more certain, than that they occasionally propel the weightiest things, broad acres, for instance, upwards.

It should, however, be here remarked, that G. S. might consistently argue, that, since the new statute, the inheritance remains vacant until some act of purchase; and that, from the death of the last purchaser to such act of purchase by some one of his successive heirs, is but one descent. For the statute seems to me simply to create a new requisite, in order to constitute a root of descent.

G. S. proceeds to write, (ante, p. 133), "J. W. notices, as an objection," &c. I reply, J. W. does no such thing in either of his papers! So much for the accuracy of G. S.

G. S. concludes with some remarks on J. W.'s difficulties as to curtesy. I do not agree with these remarks; but cannot here do more than refer to the remarks on the rationale of the question contained in my former letter, and would beg to invite particular attention to my quotations from Coke and Preston.

These names remind me of another gross misrepresentation of G. S.'s. "I am not," quoth he, (ante, p. 132), "hardy enough to dispute J. W.'s authorities, as J. C. C. does, or to assert with J. C. C., that such lawyers as Littleton and Coke were likely to forget all their learning, except so far as it might bear on the very question for the time being under consideration."

With this compare the three following passages of J. C. C.'s, the first of which supposes not that Coke—of Littleton nothing whatever is said—was likely to forget his learning on any point, but that he might possibly, through carelessness or haste, pass over a point unnoticed, and so miss an opportunity of applying his ever-ready stores of legal learning. The words used are, "that, accurate writer as Coke is, he used the expression loosely, and, as other of our greatest authorities have done, while deciding one point in a case, did not perceive another, which might also have been raised." (Ante, p. 113). And, again, "J. W. boldly proposes that the authorities are erroneous. When we state that Littleton is the person &c., and that Blackstone, Hargreave, and Preston follow on the same side, the reader will scarcely be surprised when he finds us prepared to indulge a sort of legal prejudice, and take our chance with them, rather than with J. W." (Ante, p. 115). Or, again, "Coke is an authority we are bound to follow when he tells us what the law on any point is, but" &c. (Ante, p. 116). I most positively assert that G. S. cannot, in my former letter, find any stronger passages in justification of his misrepresentation. What I did was to examine J. W.'s authorities. I greatly doubt G. S.'s having done so.

On the whole, it seems that G. S.'s view of the course of descent under the new statute coincides with that maintained in my former letter; but on this point I cannot feel very certain, so admirable is the ambiguity, so curious the confusion, of G. S.'s English style. I will only extract one example: "On the death of the purchaser's daughter after entry, her son and his aunts take by descent from the daughter, and as her heir: the act has performed its office when it has furnished the rule for ascertaining these persons." (Ante, p. 133). I should be really glad to have this sentence explained. The most natural meaning of the words seems to be, that, in the case proposed, the act furnishes us with a rule for ascertaining these persons, i. e. the purchaser's daughter's son and his aunts; and here, too, G. S. would, perhaps, tell us, "that no one can desire a sounder and more perspicuous guide." I should, however, prefer trusting to family Bibles and parish registers.

In conclusion, I must again apologise for trespassing so largely on your valuable columns, but feel sure, that, as you have inserted the misrepresentations of G. S., you will not deny me an opportunity of answering them.

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 61. 10s. in strong cloth bds. BURN'S JUSTICE of the PEACE and PARISH OFFICE. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE of the Eastern District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of these the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abridgement, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgements of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superceding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fulness of the Marginal Notes.

LONDON, MAY 9, 1846.

We return to the subject of the Charitable Trusts Bill, which seems to be exciting great, and, as it appears to us, most unfounded opposition. The bill has been represented, as we have already mentioned, (ante, p. 149), as creating commissioners "who are to superintend, or rather virtually supersede, the present managers of all charities, and take upon themselves the direction and control of the charity affairs, the disposition of the funds, and the investigation, arrangement, and regulation of all the accounts."

A very slight examination of the clauses of the bill will shew that it proposes to do nothing of the sort. The jurisdiction which it proposes to give to the commissioners, in regard to their power of regulating charities, is restricted to charities whose incomes shall not exceed 100*l*. Their jurisdiction over charities generally is confined, first, to the exercise of a power which can only be exercised by way of assistance, in supplying powers of sale, compromise, &c., where the trustees of a charity have not such powers; and, secondly, to the exercise of a power of regulating the manner in which accounts are to be kept, and of making inquiries and obtaining information as to the mode in which the funds of charities are administered.

The objects of the bill are, therefore, twofold: first, to provide a remedial jurisdiction for adjudicating between the trustees and beneficiaries of charities possessing an income not exceeding 100*l*. a year; and, secondly, to provide an inquisitorial and auditorial, but not remedial, jurisdiction, for obtaining complete information on the state of the revenues of all charities, and the mode of dealing with them. With the first of these objects we cannot conceive how any person can reasonably quarrel. It is admitted that the expense of proceeding by information in Chancery, either to remedy abuses of trust, or to appoint new trustees, or to establish a scheme for a charity, or in any way to interfere remedially, is such as to render the jurisdiction of Chancery practically quite inapplicable for the smaller charities. The Chancellor has fixed 50*l*. a year as the income under which it is impracticable to call in the aid of Chancery to prescribe for sick charities. (See his Speech in the House of Lords, 22nd May, 1845). And we are quite satisfied, that every Chancery practitioner will admit, that his Lordship might have stated a much higher amount, without being beyond the mark. It is admitted, also, that there is no other adequate jurisdiction than that of Chancery; and it is admitted, finally, that there are thousands of charities whose incomes fall far below 50*l*. a year. Now, with these three admitted facts, that there are objects of remedial jurisdiction of a particular class,—that there is no jurisdiction but Chancery for them,—and that Chancery cannot practically help them,—can any rational and unprejudiced person escape the conclusion, that the creation of a new tribunal is essential, and that such a tribunal, to be effective, must be armed with considerable powers?

The only substantial question upon which there can be a doubt is, whether the particular arrangements proposed by the bill now before Parliament, are adapted to meet the acknowledged want of a practical jurisdiction over small charity funds; and, without going the length of saying that the bill offers no handle for objection, we must say, that to us it appears defective only in some trivial matters, as to which it is very immaterial for the public service in what way they are settled. For instance, one is readily disposed to concur in the criticism put forth in a recent pamphlet on the subject, by the learned Gresham Lecturer*, upon the second clause, that the exclusive selection of a Chief Justice of the Bengal bench, out of all the Colonial Judges, as conferring a qualification for becoming a commissioner of charities, is not very intelligible. It would have been much simpler and much more consistent with usage, to have adopted the formula of the 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 19, and to have made the requisite qualification simply a standing of twelve years, which would let in, of course, Vice-Chancellors, and almost, of course, Masters in Chancery, Serjeants, and any Judge of any important colonial court. But when the criticism extends itself beyond these trivialities, and meddles with the very important 10th section of the bill, we think it must have been forgotten that that section models the powers and procedure of the commissioners as nearly as possible, consistently with the desideratum of inexpensive proceedings, upon the power and procedure of the Court of Chancery itself, of whose efficacy no doubt has ever been entertained, when it is brought to bear upon charities whose funds can bear its heavy expense.

The Court of Chancery is set in motion by the Attorney-General, at the relation of any informant. The commissioners are to be set in motion on the petition of any informant; and if they were not to be set in motion on the petition of any informant, how is any act to define what particular character a person must fill, in order to qualify him to bring the jurisdiction of the commissioners to bear? But the commissioners are not, it will be observed, directed to act upon any vague and general allegation; they are to be informed of some specific neglect, or abuse, or breach of trust, &c. And it is not to be supposed, that persons filling the high judicial situations that are to be created by the act, and sworn to do justice according to the terms of the act, will entertain frivolous informations; loading themselves with uncalled for labour, and pronouncing sentences which would ruin their reputation as judges, for the mere purpose of tormenting the trustees of charities. The 10th, 13th, 14th, and 18th clauses do, in fact, no more than place the commissioners, with reference to charities with incomes not exceeding 100*l.* a year, in the position of the Court of Chancery in reference to other charities. Yet it is on these sections that the learned writer, whose pamphlet we have already quoted, indulges in the following appeal (p. 18):—"My Lord, I hardly know what is most objectionable in these, with perhaps one or two exceptions, most objectionable provisions. They may be intended to do full justice quickly and cheaply, where the property is of small amount; but I fear they would more often lead to oppression, expense, and irremediable wrong, and prove subversive of the intention of the donors, which the law of England has endeavoured sacredly to fulfil. Where is the justice, or policy, or wisdom of establishing one tribunal for the rich, and another for the poor; one tribunal to-day, and another for the same charity (the income varying) to-morrow; of regulating the jurisdiction of the commissioners by a difficult and fluctuating criterion, uncertainly applied to the outset; of vesting in these commissioners, holding their court in any hidden room or corner of the kingdom, greater power in making orders and schemes (irrespective of the will of the do-ners) than is conceded to the high Court of Chancery; of authorising their proceeding upon any complaint, perhaps contained in an anonymous letter, when all experience testifies the necessity, to prevent oppression and groundless complaint, that the complainant failing should be responsible for costs; of allowing no appeal from the orders of the commissioners to the higher courts, though security might be offered for costs to prevent groundless appeals, thus omitting a safeguard most necessary to secure the equity of the commissioners' decisions, and making them arbitrary judges; and of not even allowing them to revise their own summary orders, unless on complaint within two months, though the subsequent finding of any mislaid old document, or other discovery, might justify their reversal? The injustice and impolicy of such provisions appear too plain for comment. I may further observe, that the powers of removing trustees, and enforcing the transfer or payment of stock or money, seem almost too great to be entrusted to the commissioners without appeal. The little contrivance to save expense on the appointment of new trustees, by making the trust estates vest in them without any conveyance, may (along with the anomaly) have the effect of depriving them of the best evidences of their title. The power, also, of authorising trustees to remove a schoolmaster, or other officer, upon proof to the commissioners' satisfaction of past negligence or present incompetency, appears too great to be exercised, in derogation of a freehold office, either without a hearing or without the right of appeal. It exceeds the power of authorising the removal of schoolmasters which was entrusted to the Court of Chancery by a recent act*."

We might well answer, "Mr. Palmer, we hardly know which is the most objectionable of your arguments. You speak of the act as establishing one tribunal for the rich and another for the poor, whereas, what it really does, is to establish what never existed before, (in these matters), a tribunal for the poor; not creating any tribunal for the rich at all. You speak of regulating the jurisdiction of the commissioners by a difficult and fluctuating criterion, without at all condescending to explain what you mean. You speak of the commissioners holding their courts in any hidden room or corner of the kingdom, when there is not one word in the act to shew an intimation that the proceedings shall be in the least degree secret. You speak of their proceeding upon any complaint, perhaps contained in an anonymous letter, as though the language of the 10th section did not, in the strongest terms, convey an expression of intention on the part of the Legislature, that the whole course of proceeding is to be judicial. And, finally, you talk with horror of confiding to courts, on whom a character of at least co-ordinate importance with that of country commissioners of bankruptcy, or the commissioners of lunacy, is impressed, the power of removing, for negligence or incompetence, the petty schoolmaster of a petty charity,—a power, you say, too great to be exercised in derogation of a freehold office; as if every schoolmaster's office was necessarily a freehold office; as if, where it is so, the holder ought necessarily to hold it in direct breach of the trusts under which he was appointed; and as if the commissioners are necessarily to be expected to cast aside all that respect for vested interests, which they will find in their great model the Court of Chancery, and their guides—its decisions. To quote your own words, 'The injustice and impolicy of your objections appear too plain for comment.'

The only question that appears to us very material in this part of the bill is, whether the decision of the commissioners should be wholly without appeal. An appeal at the expense of the charity fund would, of course, be out of the question, as it would defeat the whole object of the act. But there does not seem any good reason, why, if the litigants think fit to try an appeal at their own expense, they might not be permitted to do so; the court of appeal having, of course, power to give costs at its discretion, or to make general orders as to the mode of providing for the costs of appeals.

Our space will not permit us further to discuss at present the merits of this important bill. We hope we shall have succeeded in suggesting to the minds of some, at least, of our readers, doubts of the soundness of the objections that have been urged against it; and we hope, that, if it does pass into law, it will be the prelude to some similar legislative endeavour, to afford to the cestui que trustent of private property of small amount, the benefit of an equitable jurisdiction practically accessible.

The Practice of the High Court of Chancery. By EDMUND ROBERT DANIELL, Esq., F.R.S., a Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy. Second Edition, with considerable Alterations, &c. By THOMAS EMERSON HEADLAM, M.A., Barrister at Law.

[Stevens & Norton.]

We have no hesitation in declaring that this is the most able work which has ever been written on the practice of the Court of Chancery. And although it does not enter into all the details of the purely mechanical parts of the practice, as indeed it is not the object of the work to do, yet it is impossible to take it up, and compare it with others of similar kind, and not at once observe that it goes considerably beyond them in the nature and extent of the subjects upon which it treats, and in the manner in which those subjects are dealt with.

Mr. Daniell, in his preface to the first edition, states that he does not conceive that he is called upon to offer any apology for the publication of a treatise on the practice of the Court of Chancery, on the ground that the want of such a treatise on a more extended scale than those hitherto published had long been acknowledged; and we are glad, that, in opposition to the opinions and advice of some of his friends, he determined to carry out his views, and introduce the "Practical Observations on the Pleadings in the Court," which so usefully occupy a considerable portion of the work.

The first volume was published in 1837; the second in 1840; and Part 1 of Vol. III was published in 1841, and the remaining part in September, 1845, containing altogether 2160 pages. But before Mr. Daniell had published the last part of the third volume, the time had arrived when a new edition was required; for, as is observed by Mr. Headlam, in his preface to the present edition, "During the time which has elapsed since the publication of the first edition more extensive changes have taken place in the practice of Chancery than in any other period of similar duration in the annals of the court. Not only have numerous and most important Orders been issued, but the increase in the number of the courts of equity, and the great attention now bestowed on reporting their decisions, have multiplied the sources from which conclusions of law and rules of practice are ordinarily deduced." And we think that the manner in which the learned editor has dealt with the original work has, upon the whole, been very judicious; namely, by not retaining the original matter, and, in addition, stating the alterations that have been effected; "but by remodelling the text, so as to render it as nearly as possible what he conceived it would have been had Mr. Daniell now published it for the first time."

If, indeed, this edition had retained all the contents of the original work, it might, as Mr. Headlam observes, "have exhibited a history of the progress of the Court of Chancery practice; but its size would have prevented its being useful as a book of daily reference." And we are glad in being able to state, that, whilst Mr. Headlam has not in any degree affected the value of the original work, yet that, by the plan which he has adopted, he has saved the practitioner from the mental agony to which he would have been subjected in considering the operation and effect of repealed Orders and contradictory decisions, and in philosophising upon the abortive attempts at Chancery reform. Even with all the diligence, accuracy, and precision which Mr. Headlam has brought into the field, what a fearful picture does this book present of the existing practice of the Court of Chancery! How little, it would seem, have the reforming efforts of nearly a quarter of a century done to improve the practice of a court, in which thousands and thousands of persons are so interested! What devious mazes still remain to bewilder the practitioner! What diligence, nerve, and energy are still required, to enable the student to become acquainted with that, which is termed the practice of the Court of Chancery!

In order that some notion may be formed of the nature and extent of the subject with which the author and editor have had to deal, and the difficulty with which they have had to contend, we propose to refer (and we regret that our limits will allow us to do little more than to refer) to the leading portions of the work.

The first 374 pages are devoted to elucidate matters connected with the institution of a suit, preparatory to the filing of a bill; and it is at p. 375 of the first volume of the present edition that the practitioner is introduced to sect. 7, which treats "of filing the bill."

We then come to the section upon amending bills, the practice concerning which has been entirely altered since the first edition; and here we may observe, that the important point of practice recently decided by the Lord Chancellor in Christ's Hospital v. Grainger was anticipated by the editor, and correctly stated, as the result of the Orders, in page 394.

We arrive, at page 404, at that portion of the work which treats of the mode of enforcing an appearance and answer to the complainant's bill. In this part of the practice a very great change has taken place, in consequence of recent General Orders, and the editor has availed himself of this change, to alter the manner in which the subject was treated in the first edition. Mr. Daniell wrote separate sections on the several writs then in force, and included in his opening chapter the peculiarities of process incidental to particular defendants. Mr. Headlam has adopted another arrangement. He commences by stating the various modes of service upon defendants of a different description, or allowed under peculiar circumstances; and proceeds to detail the mode of proceeding in the event of service not being effected; assuming, then, that a subpoena has been duly served, he gives a succinct account of the several compulsory steps both to compel appearance and to compel answer. In each case, after stating the practice applicable to ordinary defendants, he proceeds to enumerate the peculiarities incident to defendants of particular characters or descriptions, as infants, married women; and here we would refer to an important passage, that will be found in page 422. Mr. Headlam, after stating the effect of the statutes 2 Will. 4, c. 33, and 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 82, under which, before the Orders of May, 1845, the practice with respect to the service of subpoenas was regulated, observes, that these acts "apply to suits of a particular description, and that they 'fetter the exercise of the privilege by certain restrictions; whereas the Orders of May, 1845, apply to suits 'of all descriptions, and in some respects dispense with 'the provisions which the Legislature had previously 'required.'"

It would seem, however, that the language of the 5 Vict. c. 5, under the authority of which the New Orders are issued, scarcely authorises the court to extend the remedies of serving a subpoena out of the jurisdiction, and to dispense with the statutory fetters previously incident to its exercise. This point has, we understand, been raised before Sir James Wigram, V.C., and if so, the decision upon it will be important to those interested in the practice of the court.

Well, then, we have reached Chapter XI, (p. 486), and thenceforth our course is over between two and three hundred pages of valuable information, as well upon the pleading as the practice connected with demurrers, pleas, and answers. And on this part of the work the editor's task has been comparatively light; but, wherever it was necessary to interweave the Orders of 1845, he appears to have done so in a very concise and proper manner; but we would, in passing, remark, that he has overlooked the case of Thompson v. Selby, (12 Sim. 100), which ought, we think, to have been noticed in the paragraph of p. 659, where it is laid down, that, "after a plea has been filed, no step can be taken in the 'cause till it has been disposed of.'"

Chapter XVIII contains the practice on motions to dismiss. Here we find that the editor has taken a different view of the effect of these Orders, in one respect, from that which has recently been decided in the case of Dalton v. Hayter, (9 Jur. 1000); for Mr. Headlam assumes that the term "last answer," used in the 37th article of the 16th Order, and in the 114th Order, means the last answer not of any one defendant, but of all the defendants; so that no application to dismiss the plaintiff's bill for want of prosecution could be sustained until after all the defendants have answered. Lord Langdale, in the case referred to, has decided, that the term "last answer" refers to the answer of any one defendant, who may move to dismiss. In a subsequent notice of the cases which have occurred during the progress of the work through the press, Mr. Headlam enters into an elaborate argument in support of his view of the subject.

In treating "of Replication," an abstract of the Orders of 1845 upon that part of the practice is introduced. Several decisions with respect to the effect of those Orders upon suits in progress at the time they came into operation have been pronounced subsequently to the publication of that portion of the work; they will, however, be found collected in a notice prefixed to this edition; and we presume that the learned editor did not contemplate the probable operation of those Orders, and the state of despair in which suitors, practitioners, and judges have alike been thrown, in construing and acting upon them, whenever there has been a conflict between the old and the new practice, or he would, prophet-like, have prepared his readers for their fate; but, upon the whole, we are not surprised that Mr. Headlam did not volunteer his services upon the occasion, as we ourselves have been witness to the difficulty and embarrassment which a most acute and eminent judge, even though having the assistance of the faithful Berry, all-powerful in points of practice, has felt in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion with respect to the course to be adopted in a case of conflict between the old Orders and the new.

We next find that important head, "Evidence," ably discussed, and divided into apt parts and sections; and this brings us to the end of volume the first.

We can do no more than just glance at the chapters on Decree, in the first part of the second volume; and we are obliged to treat the proceedings in the Master's Office with as little ceremony, though the importance of the subject would seem to require a more minute investigation. Suffice it to say, that the course to be pursued in the Master's Office, upon the various references made to him, is treated of in a very full and explanatory manner. And certainly it will not be for want of a guide to steer him through the labyrinths and gloomy recesses of those offices, if the practitioner fail in eventually reaching the end of his journey, the hearing of his suit on further directions. We ought, however, not to omit speaking in terms of commendation of the sections on the method of taking accounts and the sale of property.

Chapter XXVII contains nearly one hundred pages, and treats of the question of costs. At page 1268 the editor extracts a principle from the case of Millington v. Fox, (3 My. & C. 352), and that principle, we apprehend, with all deference to the learned and pains-taking Sir James Wigram*, is correct, viz. that, if "a plaintiff 'proceeds with a cause after he has received a complete 'offer of all that he is entitled to, the court, in the ex-

* See Colburn v. Simms, (2 Hare, 543).

'ercise of its discretion with respect to costs, will punish the unnecessary litigation by refusing him the whole costs of the suit, as well those incurred after the tender as those incurred before."

Part 2 of Volume II, which is recently published, concludes the work; and here it will be found that the learned editor has written several additional chapters under the following heads:—"Chapter XXXIII, On Writs and Orders in the Nature of Injunctions. Chapter XXXVII, On the Payment of Money or Transfer of Stock out of Court. Chapter XXXVIII, On the Production of Documents. Chapter XXXIX, On Petitions for the Appointment of Guardians, and Orders of Maintenance; and Chapter XL, On the Statutory Jurisdiction of the Court."

Chapter XXXIII affords valuable information with respect to restraining orders under stat. 5 Vict. c. 5, as well as the practice upon writs of distringas and stop orders.

The practice upon payment of money into and out of court is stated very much in detail, but not less so than the importance of the subject requires; and this part of the work is worthy of the serious attention not only of the junior but senior practitioner. Nor is the subsequent chapter, upon the difficult subject of the production of documents, less worthy of consideration. Here all the cases bearing upon the circumstances under which the production is granted or refused are discussed, and the principles to be deduced from them clearly enunciated.

The last chapter, On the statutory Jurisdiction, fills up a chasm in books of practice. The editor's remarks in his preface upon this subject are, we believe, perfectly correct. "There has not," he observes, "been any other attempt to treat of it in a connected form; and the fact, that the jurisdiction is exercised upon petitions usually unopposed, has prevented the practice concerning it being fully exhibited by reported cases." In this untrodden path Mr. Headlam appears to have received great assistance from the Registrar's office.

The 2nd and 3rd sections point out the cases to which the Charities' and Trustees' Acts respectively apply, and the course to be pursued in giving effect to the provisions thereof.

Section 4 contains the necessary information as to the payment into and out of court of money brought under the control of the Court of Chancery by the provisions of the various railway acts. And in section 5 is exhibited much useful and practical information with respect to the jurisdiction of the court over solicitors, as well statutory as otherwise; and the reciprocal rights and liabilities of solicitors and their clients, under the heads of Lien and Taxation of Costs, are discussed.

The miscellaneous statutes are disposed of in the concluding sections.

It remains to be observed, that in the present edition is contained a list of General Orders since 1828, with a reference to those parts of the body of the work where they are to be found noticed. There is also a general index, and not, as in the original work, a separate index to each volume.

It is worthy of remark, that, notwithstanding the numerous decisions which have been pronounced since the publication of the first edition, and which have been the subject of comment in the present edition, and notwithstanding the introduction of the new matter to which we have called attention, by means of an alteration in the arrangement of the letter-press, the work has not increased in bulk, and, on the other hand, the price has considerably decreased.

We trust that our readers will, upon a perusal of the work now under our notice, be satisfied that we have not overrated its merits, and that they will agree with us in thinking that it forms a valuable addition to our legal literature.

Correspondence.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE JURIST."

SIR,—The rhetoric of your correspondent J. C. C. has surprised me even more than his logic did. But, as I take no personal interest in the symbol "G. S.," and am not ambitious of sending it down to posterity with the honours of a "Junius" or a "J. C. C.," I shall not attempt any defence. Your correspondent may have proved against me, "for aught I know," every item in his black list of offences; but these offences have no more to do with the question of descent (of an estate), than have his notions of "propelling" a thing "upwards," and "devolving from a root per stirpes," or his inadvertently calling himself "I," "we," and "J. C. C." in the same paper. In his objurative character J. C. C. needs a remonstrance rather than an answer, and I will borrow for the purpose a form from one who was "of counsel" to Charles II:—

"Why so fierce and warm, J. C. C. ?

Prythee, why so warm ?

If to win with wit's not easy,

Can you do't by storm ?

Prythee, why so warm ?

Why not more astute, conveyancer,

Why not more astute ?

Will, when arguing well don't answer,

Railing merely suit ?

Why not more astute ?

Fie ! fie ! the law this will not more,—

This cannot shake it :

Unless your crotchet sound you prove,

You cannot make it :

The devil take it !"

To J. C. C. arguing, more respect is due; and, with your permission, I will say a few words (and they shall be as few and as clear as I can make them) on the important point on which I differ from him, and on which J. W. (if, upon consideration, he has not found reason to modify his opinion) differs from both of us.

J. C. C. is unwilling to recognise the vacancy of the inheritance under any circumstances, and argues that the death of an heir before entry causes a new descent. Now, if it is said that the inheritance vests sub modo in an heir before entry, (as it certainly does, for the benefit of creditors, devisees, &c.), I make no objection to the expression, which is at least as allowable, as it is to say, that the fee may vest sub modo pending the contingency of an executory limitation; and I will even grant that the conditional vesting of the inheritance may be called a descent. Thus far the difference between us is merely verbal; but it becomes substantial when J. C. C. contends, that, on the death of a coparcener before entry, there is a new descent of the share of such coparcener only. That this is not so, has, I think, been clearly proved by J. W., whose authorities shew, that, if there is indeed a second descent in the case supposed, it is a descent which is not founded on, but, on the contrary, overreaches, or effaces, the prior conditional descent, as well with respect to the estate of the surviving coparcener, as to that of the deceased. The descents are not successive, but the second is substituted for the first. A similar process is familiar in the case of a contingent or executory limitation to a class to be ascertained at a future time, as, a limitation to all the children of A., to take effect in possession at the death of A. Here, each child, as he is born, takes a vested estate, subject to be divested by the birth of a new member of the class; and yet, when all the members are ascertained, so entirely do they take as it were by one act, that their estate is joint, if the limitation contain no words of severance. (2 Stra. 1172; see Fearn, C. R. 312). So, on the death of the owner of an estate, the inheritance vests in the person or persons constituting his heir, the particular ingredients of such heir being capable of change from time to time by deaths and other events, until the inheritance is fixed, and the foundation for a new descent laid, by the entry of the heir for the time being. A much stronger case of conditional descent was recognised by the common law when a sister succeeded to the estate of her only brother, and her inheritance was defeated, even after entry, by the birth of a second brother. In that case, although the person last entitled did not die, her estate was "put in motion" by way of descent.

J. C. C. suggests that I "might consistently argue, that, since the new statute, the inheritance remains vacant until some act of purchase, and that, from the death of the last purchaser to such act of purchase by some one of his successive heirs, is but one descent." I cannot charge this misapprehension of my argument to the account of any obscurity in my language, for I said, "What shall be a descent, and from whom an estate shall descend, are questions which the act leaves untouched;" and the assumption, that the question as to what shall descend is equally unaffected by the statute, was the very basis of my argument, and also, I presume, of that of J. C. C. The language of the statute certainly presents some difficulties, but it will be found, I think, that no other construction can be adopted, without involving consequences which were certainly not intended, and which would be far more mischievous than those from which J. W. has striven to escape. See, for instance, the 5th section.

To conclude, the propositions, and the deductions from them, for which I contend, are these:—

1. That, at the common law, on the death of a coparcener before entry, there was either no new descent at all, or, if there were a new descent, it was a descent of the entirety. But, on the death of a coparcener after entry, there was a new descent of her own share only.

2. That the act to amend the law of inheritance has furnished new rules for ascertaining the heir in cases of descent, but has not (except by the enactment in sect. 3, as to devises to an heir, &c.) in any other manner altered the rules of the common law with respect to descents. So that the questions, whether or not there is a descent, what descends, and to whose heir, (or, which is the same thing, from whom), are to be determined without reference to the statute, which only comes into operation when it has been ascertained that a certain thing has descended to the heir of a certain person, and it becomes necessary to know who is such heir.

3. That, as a consequence of the foregoing propositions, if, before the statute, on the death of a coparcener who has not acquired actual seisin, the heirs for the time being of the person last seised would have been entitled to the entirety by descent from such person, so, since the statute, the heirs for the time being of such person would be entitled to the entirety by descent from him; or, more generally, as, on the death of the person last seised, his estate would, before the statute, have descended from him to his heir, so, since the statute, it will do the same; and as, on the death of an heir before entry, there was, before the statute, no descent from him to his heir of his estate or share as such, so, since the statute, there is none. And hence, on the death of one coparcener before the entry of any, the heirs of the person last seised are entitled to the inheritance of the entire estate; and, on the death of one coparcener after the entry of any, there is now, as there always was, a descent from such coparcener of her share alone to her heir. But, in each of the cases supposed, the person or persons constituting the heir must now be ascertained by rules which are different from those of the common law. G. S.

Of whom may be had, recently published,

In Six very thick octavo Volumes, price 6l. 10s. in strong cloth bds., BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE and PARISH OFFICER. The Twenty-ninth Edition, corrected and greatly enlarged, containing the Statutes and Cases to 7 & 8 Vict., inclusive, with a New Collection of Precedents. The Title "Poor" by Mr. Commissioner BERE, of the Exeter District Court of Bankruptcy; the rest of the Work by THOMAS CHITTY, Esq., of the Inner Temple.

On introducing a new and greatly improved edition of an old-established book, like "Burn's Justice," to the notice of the Members of the Magistracy and the Legal Profession, the Publishers need only point attention to the claims which it has upon two such large and influential bodies, to ensure a success similar to that which has attended all previous editions. Since the year 1837 (the date of the last edition) a considerable number of important Statutes have been passed; by several of these Statutes the executive power of the Magistrate has been somewhat restricted, and by others extended, while the whole duties of the office have undergone too many changes not to render a New Edition (embodying every Act and decision to the present time) a valuable and necessary addition to the Libraries of Gentlemen engaged in the Local Administration of Justice. The Six Volumes have received a thorough revision; the Forms have been re-modelled, and carefully adapted to the recent changes; several new Titles (created by modern enactments) have been introduced, and great exertions have been made to ensure a correct and full development of the Law as it now stands. The title "Poor," which occupies the whole of the Fourth Volume, has again been prepared by Mr. Commissioner BERE; and his object has been to furnish the cases at full length, being satisfied that no compendious abstract, however carefully made, would supply a satisfactory Manual for those who attend the Quarter Sessions. The Marginal Notes and the Index are, however, abridgments of the Cases, so that the general principles of the Law may be ascertained without reading the fuller statement. The great utility of the Work as an authority, presenting the cases in detail, and superseding the Reports themselves, is thereby preserved, at the same time that the necessity of reading the whole is obviated by the fulness of the Marginal Notes.

LONDON, MAY 16, 1846.

THE notice which has lately been attracted to the mode of election to the office of Benchers of the Inner Temple will probably, as frequently happens in similar cases, lead to an inquiry having much more extensive objects than that would seem to require. We fear the issue of court will prove to be like an old and badly constructed building, of which no part can be disturbed without causing the fall of the whole. For years, we may almost say for centuries past, the governing bodies of these societies have claimed and exercised an uncontrolled and irresponsible power, acquiesced in probably because no one who had the inclination has had the power, or, having the power, has had the inclination, to make any inquiry upon the subject. But the case is now altered. The recent exercise of the mode of election was too startling, and affected too seriously the feelings of the Bar generally, not to call for a searching investigation into its legality, and the right of the Benchers to lay down any such rule as that upon which they have acted; and an inquiry into that has necessarily led to an inquiry into other matters connected with the office of a Benchers, and the privileges and duties attached to it. Accordingly, we find an article in an able cotemporary*, the writer of which, after adverting to the question immediately at issue, proceeds to examine into the early history of the inns of court, and to consider the office of Benchers, and his power over the members of the Bar.

Our readers are all well acquainted with Blackstone's account of the origin of the inns of court, but few probably have read Coke's account of the mode in which degrees were formerly conferred in them, and from which the present ranks in the Profession have been derived. "Now, for the degrees of the law," says he, "as there be in the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford divers degrees, as general sophisters, bachelors, masters, doctors, of whom be chosen men for eminent and judicial places, both in the Church and in the ecclesiastical courts; so, in the profession of the law, there are mootemen, (which are those that argue reader's cases in houses of Chancery, both in terms and grand vacations). Of mootemen, after eight years' study†, or thereabouts, are chosen utter-barrister: of these are chosen readers in inns of Chancery. Of utter-barristers, after they have been of that degree twelve years at least, are chosen benchers or ancients, of which one, that is of the puisne sort, reads yearly in Summer Vacation, and is called 'a single reader;' and one of the ancients that had formerly read reads in Lent Vacation, and is called 'a double reader,' and commonly it is, between his first and second reading, about nine or ten years. And out of these the king makes choice of his attorney and solicitor-general, his attorney of the Court of Wards and Liveries, and attorney of the Duchy. And of these readers are serjeants elected by the king, and are, by the king's writ, called 'ad statum et gradum servientis ad legem;' and out of these the king electeth one, two, or three, as please him, to be his serjeants, which are called The King's Serjeants."

The Benchers or ancients were the rulers of the inn, and, as the writer we have quoted observes, their overactive zeal was in exact proportion to the apathy of modern Benchers. With regard to lectures and tuition, these latter, indeed, seem to have carried their apathy so far, as to have forgotten their original character, and to have considered themselves more as an association or club of gentlemen, than a public body, intrusted with important functions, and answerable for the proper exercise of them.

In the debate upon Mr. O'Connell's motion in the House of Commons, May 14, 1884, the late Lord Abinger asserted that the whole of the property of the inns of court was the result of subscriptions amongst themselves, which had been handed down from one set of trustees to another, and was, in fact, as much private property as that which belonged to any gentleman in the House. If Lord Abinger had ever seen the document which the writer in The Law Review has brought to light, he would not have ventured to make such an assertion. It appears, by letters-patent, (which are to be seen in the Rolls Chapel), that James I., in the sixth year of his reign, made a grant to the Societies of the Middle and Inner Temple of the land and buildings which they had held as tenants to the Knights Hospitallers till the suppression of the order in the reign of Henry VIII., and afterwards of the Crown by lease. The grant is "to Sir Julius Cæsar, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, and fifty others, by name, probably Benchers, but who are not so described, and their heirs, in trust pro hospitacione et educatione professorum et studiosorum legum Angliæ." It is clear from this, that, in the Middle and Inner Temple, at least, the Benchers were trustees, and, if so, to whom were they responsible for the performance of their trust? We shall see that there is abundance of authority to shew that they were subject to a superior jurisdiction. They were, in fact, under the control of the Crown, and of the judges as representing the Crown; and various instances are given in the work we have quoted of orders respecting the government of the inns of court, made sometimes by the advice of the Privy Council and judges, sometimes by the judges only, and sometimes by the Benchers, by the advice and discretion of the judges, proceeding from the king's suggestion. The following is one of them:—

"Orders necessary for the Government of the Innes of Court, established by the Commandement of the Queen's Majesty, with the Advice of her Privy Counsell and the Justices of her Bench and the Common Place at Westminster, in Easter Term, an. 16 Reginæ Elizabethæ, 1574.

"Imprimis, That no more in number be admitted from henceforth than the chambers of the houses will receive after two to a chamber; nor that any more chambers shall be builded to increase the number, saving that, in the Middle Temple, they may convert their old hall into chambers, not exceeding the number of ten chambers.

"Item. None hereafter admitted shall enjoy any chamber, or be in commons, unless he do exercise moots and other exercises of learning within three years after his admission, and be allowed a student or inner barrister by the Bench.

"Item. None to be called to the utter bar but by the ordinary counsell of the house, in their general ordinary counsells in the term time."

We here find the Crown and judges making regulations as to the number to be admitted, and as to calling to the bar. The next instance relates more particularly to Benchers:—

"At Serjeants Inn, 20 Junij, anno 38 Eliz., It was agreed by all the judges, by the assent of the Benchers of the four innes of court, that hereafter none should be admitted into innes of court till he may have a chamber within the house.

"That the readers hereafter be chosen for their learning, for their duly keeping of the exercises of their house, for their honest behaviour and good disposition, and such as for their experience and practice be able to serve the commonwealth.

"That no Benchers be called but such as be fittest both for their learning, practice, good and honest conversation; and that they call not to the bench too often, but very sparingly, in respect of the great multitude that there is already."

We should like to know what was then thought a great multitude; something, we expect, far short of the number at the present day.

We will only add one of the general orders of 36 Eliz., addressed to all the inns, in which the controlling power of the judges is strikingly exemplified. It is as follows:—

"That, before any be called to read, a note of the names of three or four next in turn to read be delivered to the justices of the house where the same shall be; and, in default of such justice, to the chief justices and chief baron for the time being, to the end that they may give their advice therein."

These and similar instances which we might quote shew conclusively that the judges formerly exercised the power of regulating the inns of court; and if so, when have they ever been deprived of it? That it has not been exercised in modern times is true, but that is because no case has ever been properly brought before them. Besides, mere non-user would not destroy their right, and the power they had in the time of Queen Elizabeth they must still possess, and may exercise when an occasion requires it. And what is the result of this? Let the Benchers of the different inns consider well their position. That they and their predecessors for many years past have been guilty of supineness and apathy, none can doubt; that they have not done anything towards carrying out the object of their institution, have not performed the trust on which, in two at least of the inns of court, they hold their property, is not to be denied; indeed, the late movement at the Middle Temple confesses it. It behoves them then to rouse themselves to do that, which, if they fail to do, the time will inevitably come, when their power will be taken away from them, and placed in more active and willing hands.

MASTER IN CHANCERY.—The Lord Chancellor has appointed James Perrin, of Wotton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, Gent., to be a Master Extraordinary in the high Court of Chancery.

ON THE MODES OF BARRING THE RIGHT OF SURVIVORSHIP OF A MARRIED WOMAN IN REVERSIONARY PERSONAL INTERESTS.

In a paper, contained in a former Number of THE JURIST, (vol. 9, p. 514), the authorities bearing upon the question, whether a married woman's equitable reversionary interest in personalty, expectant upon the termination of a preceding life interest, can be barred, were collected and discussed; and it was urged, that, upon principle, admitting the authorities to leave the question in a doubtful state, the release of the preceding life interest, either to the wife or to the husband, could not have, either technically or consistently with the doctrines of equity, the effect of rendering the wife's right by survivorship capable of reduction into possession.

A pamphlet has recently been published by a learned writer*, in which it is suggested that the object in question may be attained by the circuitous method of the prior tenant for life assigning his interest to a trustee, upon such trusts as the wife shall appoint, and then the wife appointing to herself. By this proceeding, it is contended, the wife would acquire an immediate absolute interest in the fund, which would thus be brought within the disposition of the husband; and if the fund were then transferred to the husband, a reduction into possession would be effected, which would bar the claim of the wife surviving. This we take to be the substance of the doctrine contained in the opinion given by Mr. Swinburne, and printed in his pamphlet, (page 7); and we shall proceed to discuss its soundness†.

According to the view that we take on this subject, the grounds of objection to the plan suggested by Mr. Jacob, which was the foundation of Oldham v. Lewis, (Lewin on Trusts, 296), are two: first, the purely technical one, that there can be no merger by a surrender of the prior life interest either to the wife or to the husband; and, secondly, the purely equitable one, that a court of equity will not assist a married woman to deprive herself of any right which she would have by law, if equity did not interfere; or, to adopt Mr. Jacob's mode of expressing it, that the court might think the assignment of the prior life interest to the wife a contrivance to defeat her right by survivorship, and might, perhaps, not hold her bound by it. We do not understand Mr. Swinburne, in his pamphlet, to dispute the validity of these objections, when the surrender is directly to the wife herself. We do not mean to say that he admits their validity; but he offers no observations against it. He appears, however, to conceive, that his suggested plan is intrinsically different, and effective, whatever may be the fate of Mr. Jacob's; and we collect, that he grounds the efficacy of his plan on the amalgamation of the life interest and the reversionary interest, being the result of the wife's own act, where, as he recommends, a power of appointment is incorporated. At least, this appears to be the spirit of the following passage, in p. 29 of Mr. Swinburne's pamphlet:—

"On the cases of Bean v. Sykes and Wilson v. Oldham, the writer would observe, that, under the mode of proceeding hitherto adopted to effect the dis-settlement in such cases, the safety of the trustees, for the reasons stated by Mr. Lewin and Mr. Jacob, can be ensured only by setting the absolute and irresponsible power of the court between them and the surviving wife, under the plan of proceeding suggested by the writer, which is to assign the life interest to a trustee, upon such trusts as the feme covert reversioner shall appoint, and then for the feme covert to appoint in favour of herself. There would not be the same occasion for the trustees to seek to shield themselves under the irresponsibility of the court; they would be enabled to ground their defence against the surviving wife on the legal operation of the res geste, and on the iniquity or want of equity of the wife's claim, inasmuch as it might, consistently with the established doctrines of equity, be contended, on the part of the trustees, and could not be disputed on the part of the surviving wife, that she had acted in the matter as a free agent, and had, by her own act while so acting, brought the reversion into possession, and put the fund into such a state as enabled the trustees, upon the clearest principles of equity, to transfer it without committing any breach of trust."

* "The Means of dis-settling and dealing with Personal Funds," &c. By T. Swinburne, M.A., Barrister. Blankarn.

† The learned writer has also printed the opinion contrā of a Mr. —, whom he designates as of great eminence; and his own reply to such opinion, against which he argues, not without acuteness, but not without acrimony. With this feud we shall not meddle. It is not for us, as the Lord Chancellor expresses it in The Duke of Leeds v. Amherst, (9 Jur. 359), "cantas componere lites"—to bring ourselves within the wind of such a commotion. We shall, therefore, satisfy ourselves with discussing the dry question, whether Mr. Swinburne's dis-settling machinery will produce its intended effect.

Now, it appears to us, that whatever arguments are of weight against the effect of a surrender of the life interest directly to the wife, are of equal weight against a surrender to a trustee, to such person as she shall appoint, completed by an appointment to herself contemporaneous with, or immediately following, the assignment.

Firstly, upon the technical ground of merger, which is the stated ground of the decision in Lachton v. Adams, (5 Law Journ., N. S., C., 382). The objection to the notion of merger of the life interest in the wife's reversionary interest where there is a surrender to her, is, that the wife cannot irrevocably assent to the gift to herself of an estate, but, by reason of her incapacity of coverture, can accept it only sub modo, viz. subject to her right of disclaiming it on becoming discoverte. Now, a general power of appointment, which can be exercised in favour of the donee absolutely, is in the nature of an estate; and it might, we think, be successfully contended, that a married woman can no more be conclusively bound by her acceptance of such a power, than she could by her acceptance of an actual estate. Hence, if this view be correct, the exercise by the married woman of the power of appointment, which is the formal acceptance of the estate coupled with the power, cannot be binding upon her, and, therefore, would not produce the required merger.

On the second, or equitable ground, the argument against Mr. Swinburne's proposed plan for destroying a married woman's right by survivorship, appears to us still stronger. If the court would not, in the case of surrender directly to the wife, hold her consent to the transfer of the fund binding upon her, on the ground of the transaction being a contrivance to defeat her right, in other words, a fraud upon the settlement, why should it suffer itself to be drawn aside from this broad equity, by the mere technical contrivance of interposing a power? If the legal right of the husband is not apparent,—if the assistance or interference of equity is at all requisite,—would a court of equity, on a question of the purest equity, tolerate the argument, that a married woman acts as a free agent, merely because she acts as the donee of a power to appoint to herself, instead of being the direct donee of an interest, when the whole transaction upon the face of it purports to be a mere contrivance to make her the instrument of defeating her equity? Could one be heard in equity to say that the gift to a married woman of a power given for the express purpose of enabling her to defeat her equitable right, and the exercise of the power by a deed contemporaneous with the gift of it, do not form together as complete an intended fraud upon the settlement, as a surrender of the life estate directly to her? There is no distinction between the two transactions, unless it be technical. If there be such a technical distinction, its efficacy, if any, must be upon the rights of property that the law casts upon the parties. If the effect of it be to create a bonâ fide merger of the life interest, and an acceleration of the wife's reversion, stripped of its ingredient the contingent right of survivorship, then, of course, cadit questio; but if there is no such technical efficacy in the introduction of the proposed power of appointment, as affecting the common-law rights of the parties in the sort of case discussed, and we contend there is none, then we contend also, that, in equity, what will be looked at is, whether the transaction, taken as a whole, is not a fraudulent contrivance to destroy the wife's right by survivorship; and the court will not trouble itself, whether the wife be apparently a free agent, or not. The broad doctrine of equity, as between husband and wife, is this: if the husband has a legal right of property, equity will not in general take it from him; if he has not, the court will neither aid him in obtaining from the wife, nor suffer her by any act of her own to deprive herself of her legal rights of property.

A REPOSITORY OF POINTS IN EQUITY AND CONVEYANCING,

Designed to combine the Advantages of an Abridgment of, and an Index to, the recent Cases, and of an original Statement of the Points established thereby.

By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L.,

PREFACE.

This Repository comprises the points in equity jurisprudence (as distinguished from equity pleadings and practice) and in conveyancing, which occur in THE JURIST, from the beginning of the Tenth Volume to the end of March; in the Law Journal, New Series, from January to March, inclusive; and in the other Reports published during the same period, namely, 12 Clark & Fennelly, part 2; 2 Collyer, part 1; 4 Hare, part 3; 5 Adolphus & Ellis, part 5; 6 Adolphus & Ellis, part 1; 14 Meeson & Welsby, parts 2 and 3; and 7 Manning & Granger, part 3. And it has been written with the hope that it will be considered to relieve the Profession from the arduous labour of reading and making notes of the cases in equity and conveyancing; although, of course, nothing can remove the expediency of possessing the reports themselves, for the purpose of quotation and reference; and, if possible, it will be succeeded by another part every three or four months, comprising the cases in all the reports published within the intervening period.

The reporters' marginal abstracts of the cases are very accurate and ably written, and are doubtless framed in the best mode for assisting the practitioner in referring to the cases. But, on that very account, they are necessarily ill calculated for conveying to the mind, and enabling it to retain, the points and principles involved in those cases, because those abstracts are, and were designed to be, merely abridged statements of the particular cases reported, and not propositions, rules, or placita so framed as to exhibit with brevity and perspicuity the precise points of law and equity which the decisions in those cases have established, divested of the names, dates, sums, quantities, and other particulars which are of no use to the student, and have no connexion with the cases with reference to which such decisions are consulted by the practitioner.

In the present attempt, which entirely differs from the existing periodical digests, the aim of the writer has been to accomplish the difficult design of moulding the essential parts of the cases into precise placita, in such a way as to exhibit the points of law and equity which the decisions in those cases serve to establish, with the grounds and reasons for those decisions. He has not worded these placita in more general terms, because it would be unsafe to deduce a general rule from a single case, especially as the decisions are so frequently grounded upon the particular circumstances, and because, if worded less specifically, the placita would not answer the purpose of a Digest of the Cases, by acquainting the practitioner, as they will when framed as above, with the degree of resemblance or material difference between the cases from which they are derived, and the cases occurring in practice with reference to which such placita may be consulted.

As these placita are designed not only for reference, but for regular perusal, to acquaint the practitioner and student with the newly decided points of law and equity as early as possible, it seems highly desirable to publish them quarterly, or as nearly so as opportunity will permit. At the same time, the advantages for reference of an annual index will be easily and completely secured, by embodying, at the end of the year, the principal and subordinate titles of the several placita in the General Index to the miscellaneous portion of THE JURIST.

It has been suggested to the writer, that he should confine the Repository to the leading cases. But he conceives that this would be unsatisfactory: for, what one might consider to be a leading case, another might not; and what might be a very unimportant decision to most persons, might to some one be of the utmost moment, as being peculiarly applicable to his own particular case; and cases which may never be followed by others of the same kind, may, nevertheless, be of great indirect value, in deciding other cases to which they bear some analogy.

PART I.

ADMINISTRATOR.

Equitable Assets.—When a testator devises real estate upon trust to sell, and declares that the proceeds shall be deemed part of his personal estate, and then proceeds to make a disposition of his personal estate after payment of his debts, the real estate is equitable assets for payment of debts. Shakels v. Richardson, 2 Coll. 31.

Priority of Debt due for Rent from a Tenant from Year to Year.—In the administration of assets, a debt due for rent of land occupied by a tenant from year to year has priority over ordinary simple contract debts. Clough v. French, 15 Law J. 24—V. C. E.

AGREEMENT.

Usurious Contract.—Where a builder, to whom a person has agreed to grant a lease for a long term of years for building purposes, receives advances of money to enable him to carry on the building, and thereupon it is agreed that the lease shall be made or assigned to the lender, and that the borrower shall pay rent to the lender at the rate of 8l. per cent. from the date of each payment, and take a lease from him, but that the borrower is to have the option of selling the houses, provided he pays the lender the amount advanced, and all rent due, such an agreement is usurious and void. Belcher v. Vardon, 2 Coll. 162.

Usurious Contract entered into by one who afterwards becomes Bankrupt.—Assignees of a bankrupt who seek relief against one of his creditors in respect of an usurious contract entered into by the bankrupt, are not required to pay the whole amount fairly due to such creditor, but are entitled to relief upon the terms of allowing a proof under the fiat for that amount, and interest at 6l. per cent. Id.

Part of an Agreement enforced by Injunction.—Agreement not to engage in a Business.—Where an agreement consists of two parts, and one of them cannot be enforced, the Court of Chancery will nevertheless enforce the other part, where it is quite distinct, and mainly founded on a distinct valuable consideration, although the part which cannot be enforced may have formed part of the inducement to enter into the other part which is enforced. So that, where one person, in consideration of a sum of money, agrees not to engage in a certain business within a certain locality, and the other party agrees to employ him in that business at a salary so long as that business shall be carried on, or the latter shall diligently and faithfully attend to it, the first part of the agreement will be enforced by injunction, although the second part may not be capable of being enforced. Rolfe v. Rolfe, 10 Jur. 61—V. C. E.

If a person agrees not to carry on, practise, or engage in a certain business within a particular locality, he violates his agreement if he acts as foreman to another person in that business. Id.

See "Specific Performance."

ANNUITIES.

Whether perpetual, or for Life only.—Where a testator wills that his property "produce" to his wife and another relative certain "annuities," and to two of his children, for whom he makes no other provision, certain "annuities" for themselves and their children, (who are not then in esse), the said annuities, after the decease of his wife and the other relative, to be equally divided between his children, such annuities are not mere life annuities, but are perpetual annuities, that is, gifts of so much property as will produce an annual income to the amount specified; for it is clear that the duration of the annuities given to the wife and the other relative are not to be measured by the lives of the first takers, since the very same annuities are limited over on the death of the first takers, as annuities continuing to subsist beyond that period; and it is obvious, that, by the annuities given to the two children, a benefit was intended for their unborn children as much as for themselves; and yet it would be very inconvenient that the children of the testator's children should take as coetests que trust simultaneously with their parents: and the testator's children might die shortly after the birth of the grandchildren; and, in that case, if the annuities then dropped, the grandchildren would be deprived of all benefit from the testator's bounty in the very event in which they would most need it. So that the best way of effectuating the plain intention of the testator, to benefit the grandchildren, is to give to their parents the absolute interest in such an amount as will produce the annuities; for, although there is no certainty, even in this case, that the grandchildren will take any part of the property in which the children have the absolute interest, since the children may otherwise dispose of it in their lifetime, or render it liable to the claims of creditors, yet, by giving the absolute interest to the children, the grandchildren may, and, but for the fault of the children, will, take derivatively through them, by deed or will, or under the Statute of Distributions. Stokes v. Heron, 12 Cl. & Fin. 161.

Construction of a Codicil, with reference to the question whether it cuts down an Annuity given by Will to a Life Annuity.—Where a testator wills that his property produce an annuity to his daughter for herself and her children, and it is held that this disposition, viewed by itself, gives a perpetual annuity to the daughter; and, by a codicil, the testator makes a declaration, beginning with the copulative conjunction "and," stating, that in case the residuary devisees and legatees named in his will shall die without leaving issue male, his will is, that, after the decease of his wife (who is also an annuitant) and his daughter, his "remaining property shall then be equally divided between" certain collateral relatives and their children: this subsequent disposition does not cut down the daughter's annuity to a life annuity, or in any way affect it, but is a mere substitution of other residuary devisees and legatees for the one named in the will, in case of the death of the latter without leaving issue male; for the words "my remaining property" mean that which has not been before disposed of, and exactly correspond to, and are simply descriptive of, the "rest and residue" mentioned in the will, and consequently have no effect upon the preceding particular dispositions. Id.

ASSIGNMENT.

Good except as against Creditors.—Although an assignment be fraudulent as against creditors, it operates to pass the goods as against the party himself and strangers. Bessey v. Windham, 6 Adol. & Ell. 166.

Whether a Deed be a present bonâ Fide Assignment, and whether it passes things subsequently to be brought on the premises mentioned therein.—Where a deed purports to assign household goods and furniture, and other things (including some perishable articles) which at the date thereof are, or at any time during the continuance of the security thereby created shall be, in, about, and belonging to certain houses and lands; subject to be avoided on repayment of a sum of money on a given day, or at such earlier time as the assignee shall appoint by notice ten days before such time, with interest in the meantime; and the deed contains a declaration, that, after default in payment of the said sum and interest, the assignee may take possession of, and hold and enjoy the said goods, &c., and also sell and dispose of the same for payment of such sum, and interest and expenses; and, further, that until such default, the assignee may hold, make use of, and possess the said goods, &c.: the deed is a present assignment, bonâ fide intended to pass the property at all events, and not a fraudulent assignment, intended to defeat another creditor, or an assignment which will not pass the ownership until default in payment. But the deed cannot operate as an assignment of goods thereafter to be brought upon the premises. Gale v. Burrell, 10 Jur. 198—Q. B.

Incomplete voluntary Assignment of Turnpike-bonds and Shares in a Company.—Where a person, by a voluntary deed, assigns turnpike-bonds and shares in a company to a trustee, in trust for himself for life, and, after his death, for a relative, and delivers to the trustee the bonds and share certificates, but such steps as are required by the General Turnpike Act, 3 Geo. 4, c. 126, s. 81, and by the rules of the company, in order to effect an assignment, are not taken, nothing passes by the deed. Searle v. Law, 10 Jur. 191—V. C. E.

CHARGE.—See "Debt."

CHOSE IN ACTION.

Interest in a Partnership.—Railway Share.—An interest in a partnership, (such as a railway share), being a chose in action, is not assignable at law, so as to enable the assignee to sue as a partner; but it is a thing of value, and may be made the subject of a valid contract. Tempest v. Kimer, 15 Law J. 10—C. P.

CONSTRUCTION.

Meaning of the Words "Mines," "Minerals," and "Fossils."—Where waste lands, to the soil of which, including everything beneath the surface, the lord of the manor is entitled, are allotted under an Inclosure Act, which takes away from the lord all right to and interest in the soil, except that it reserves to him all mines and minerals of what nature or kind soever, with the liberty of digging for and carrying away the lead ore, lead, coals, ironstone, and fossils to be gotten thereout; with a proviso that he shall keep the first layer or stratum of earth separate, without mixing the same with the lower strata; the word "mines" includes quarries out of which anything is dug; and the word "minerals" includes stone, as also does the word "fossils." This construction derives support from a consideration of the object of the Act, which is simply to give the surface for cultivation to the commoners; and it is greatly favoured by the proviso against mixing the upper and lower strata. The Earl of Rosse v. Wainman, 15 Law J. 67—Exch.

CONTRACT.—See "Agreement," "Specific Performance."

DEBTS.

Annuity included in the word "Debts."—Where it appears, from certain letters and from parol evidence, that a testator, for valuable consideration, contracted to grant an annuity, and he devises estates upon trust to pay, satisfy, and discharge all debts, whether by bond or mortgage, or due on simple contract, in exoneration of his personal estate, the annuity is charged as a debt on the real estate. Money Penny v. Maschal, 2 Coll. 213.

Damages for a Breach of Covenant after the Com-lessor's Death, recoverable as a Debt under a Charge for Payment of Debts.—Where a lessor covenants for quiet enjoyment, and devises his real estates, subject to, and charged with, the payment of his debts, and after the lessor's death the lessee is evicted, and mesne profits are recovered from him, and he subsequently recovers damages against the lessor's executors, but the lessor's personal estate is insufficient to pay such damages, the lessee is entitled to have the loss sustained by him from the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment made good as a debt out of the real estate devised, under the charge for payment of the testator's debts, including, as constituent parts of such loss, the costs of the action of ejectment, and the action for mesne profits, and the action of covenant, and the action for ascertaining the value of the lease and of the crops on the ground, and the value so ascertained, together with interest at 4l. per cent on the same from the time when the same was so ascertained, and on such costs. Morse v. Tucker, 10 Jur. 173—V. C. W.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

Superiority of the Title of Cestuis que Trust and of a Title by Set-off over an equitable Title of the Indorsee of a Promissory Note.—Where a trustee allows a sum of money, to a part of which he is beneficially entitled, to remain on a promissory note payable to himself only, and not to him or his order, and he afterwards, as a security for advances, indorses the note to a person who is both his own banker and the banker of the maker of the note, and who had no notice of the trust, and subsequently the maker of the note becomes a creditor of the trustee for goods sold, without notice of the indorsement of the note; in such case, as to the trust portion of the money secured by the note, the trust prevails against the banker's security, because the banker acquired only an equitable title, and therefore no better title to the note, or the money secured by it, than the indorser could rightfully confer, and, consequently, no title as against those for whom he is a trustee. And, as to the portion to which the indorser of the note is beneficially entitled, the set-off of the maker of the note prevails against the banker's title, as regards the amount of such set-off prior to the time of the former receiving notice of that title; but, subject to the trust and the set-off, the banker has a lien or specific claim in equity to the money secured by the note, and lying as a balance in his hands. Moore v. Jarvis, 2 Coll. 60.

Displacing Set-off.—Where the debtor gives a promissory note, and, as a collateral security, deposits a policy of assurance, and afterwards obtains the policy back, he does not thereby displace a right of set-off which he had before the delivery back of the policy. Id.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR, AND SOLICITOR AND CLIENT.

Composition-deed.—Where a debtor and his creditors, among whom is his solicitor, execute a composition-deed, whereby the debtor covenants to pay a certain sum annually for a certain period, and to insure his life forthwith for the aggregate amount so agreed to be paid to secure the payment of such amount, and the deed contains a proviso, that if the debtor shall fail in paying any of such sums, or in effecting or keeping on foot such insurance, the deed shall be void; and the solicitor neglects to explain to his client, the debtor, or to ascertain whether the debtor understands, the obligation imposed on him by the deed, which it was the duty of the solicitor to do, and the debtor does not insure his life until after the payment of the first instalment, and only for the amount then remaining due, the solicitor cannot insist on the proviso for avoiding the deed, and may be restrained from prosecuting an action for his entire debt, even though there was a private agreement between the debtor and the solicitor, when the deed was prepared, that the debt due to the latter should be paid in full. Watts v. Hyde, 10 Jur. 127—V. C. B.

DEVISE.

"Heir or Heirs," a Designatio Personarum.—Where a testator, by a will made before the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, after devising particular estates in real property, has devised the same to such person or persons as, at the time of his decease, should be the heir or heirs at law of a particular individual; the words "heir or heirs at law" are simply a designatio personarum; the words "such person or persons as at the time of my decease shall be" depriving the former of the force and effect of words of limitation, which, but for the words last quoted, they would have possessed, in addition to the sense of a designatio personarum; and hence the person answering the description of heir of the individual named takes only a life estate, although the testator recites that the estate came to him from that individual, and although it would seem most probable that he intended to give back the ultimate fee to the family of that individual, on failure of his own family. Dee d. Sams v. Garlick, 15 Law J. 54—Exch.

Effect of a Charge in passing the Fee.—A devise of real estate, before the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, subject to and charged with an annuity, will not pass a fee, without words of limitation, by force of the words "subject to and charged with the annuity," because, in this case, the annuity is not charged upon the person of the devisee, but only upon the estate; and, therefore, no argument can be drawn from the charge, that a fee was intended to be given. Id.

DONATIO INTER VIVOS—DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

What will constitute such a Donation.—It would seem that a gift which was intended to take effect at the same time and in the same way as a will cannot be a donatio inter vivos; and it would seem, that, to constitute an act a donatio mortis causa, the subject-matter must be delivered, either in terms, or unequivocally in effect, as a donatio mortis causa. Hence, where a person, a considerable time (two years, for instance) before his death, incloses certain securities, and a writing mentioning the persons for whom they were intended, in a wrapper directed to those persons, and places them in a tin box in the presence of another person, whose name is on the box, and gives the key to him, and, in his last sickness, sends the box and contents to that person, but in the writing has made it clearly appear that he did not intend the objects of his bounty to take any interest in his lifetime, and has accordingly dealt with the property as his own in the intermediate time: in such case, the person to whom the box was delivered is deemed to have had possession in the character of an agent only; and the transaction is not a donatio inter vivos, because it was clearly intended as a testamentary act; and it is not a donatio mortis causa, because there is nothing to shew that the delivery was any other than a delivery to a mere agent, as such. Ferguson v. Carr, 10 Jur. 63—V. C. B. In this case, the box also contained title-deeds of property, part of which was devised to other persons; but it was not necessary to lay any stress on that circumstance.

ELECTION.

As to a Scotch Heritable Bond.—Where a testator, by a will made before the stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, devised all the residue of his real, personal, and mixed estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, which he might be seized or possessed of or entitled to at the time of his decease, upon trust, as to a part, for his heir-at-law; and, after the date of the will, a Scotch heritable bond, which, according to the law of Scotland, belongs to the eldest son, as heir-at-law, was executed to the testator, to secure a debt existing at the date of the will; the heir-at-law is not put to his election as to the bond debt, but is entitled both to the bond debt and to the share of the general residue given him by the will. Allen v. Anderson, 10 Jur. 196—V. C. W.

ESTATE.

Legal Fee in a Trustee, with vested Estates Tail in the Cestui que Trust.—Where a testator gives in trust to a person, the remainder of his property, of whatsoever kind, to assist him to bring up, educate, and provide for the children of another person, whom he names individually, and he directs, that, when the youngest attains the age of twenty-one years, all his property be equally divided amongst them or their lawful issue, but the division is not to take place, notwithstanding the youngest child have attained twenty-one, until the death of certain persons, the trustee takes the legal estate in fee, and the children vested equitable estates tail on the death of the testator. Parkin v. Knight, 10 Jur. 23—V. C. E.

As to Quantity of Estate, see "Annuities."

EXECUTOR.

Devise or Bequest to an Executor, but not in that Character.—Where a testator, without formally appointing his executor, gives real or personal property to his "brother," (naming him), and adds to his name the designation "my executor," the legacy, notwithstanding that designation, will not be deemed to be given to the testator's brother in his character of executor; so that he will not lose the gift by not proving and not acting under the will. Compton v. Blozham, 2 Coll. 201.

Indemnity against his Testator's Covenants.—If an executor unconditionally assents to a specific bequest of leasehold estate, he can require no indemnity out of the testator's general estate in respect of covenants in the lease entered into by the testator. Shadbolt v. Woodfall, 2 Coll. 30.

EXONERATION OF PERSONALTY—See "Debts."

FRAUD.

Copying a Trade-mark.—Where a trade-mark used by one person is closely imitated by another, as the latter himself admits, he is liable to an injunction, although the word which constitutes the principal characteristic in the trade-mark may have been used by third persons before it was used by the plaintiff: for the defendant must be taken to have so closely imitated the trade-mark, with an intent to gain an advantage to which he was not entitled. Hins v. Lart, 10 Jur. 106—V. C. E. In this case the trade-mark consisted of the word "Ethiopian," marked in a particular way on black stockings.

Solicitor, as Mortgagee, transferring a Mortgage, and then selling the Estate without Notice of the Transfer, and absconding with the Purchase-money.—Where a solicitor takes a mortgage in fee from a client, and enters into possession of the estate, and afterwards transfers the mortgage to another client by a deed drawn in his own office, and delivers the title-deeds to him, but remains in possession of the estate, and subsequently procures the title-deeds from the transferee, except the deeds of transfer, for the purpose, as the transferee was aware, of preparing an abstract for a proposed purchaser, and the solicitor sells the estate to such purchaser, and receives the purchase-money, and delivers to him the title-deeds, except the deeds of transfer retained by the transferee, and puts the purchaser into possession without notice of the transferee's title, and then absconds; in such case, if the transferee had not notice, before the solicitor absconded, of the payment of the purchase-money to the solicitor, and had not authorised or assented to the solicitor's receiving the purchase-money, he will not be postponed to the purchaser. For there is no reason to suppose that he kept back the deed of transfer in order to enable the solicitor to commit a fraud, as he would naturally prefer keeping that deed, and he would see no necessity for parting with it, inasmuch as the solicitor, having prepared it, would of course have a copy of it, which he could use for the abstract; and he had no right to suspect that the solicitor intended to commit a fraud by concealing the transfer of the mortgage, and, therefore, he had a right to think the purchase-money would not be paid by the purchaser without the delivery of his deed of transfer. Stevens v. Stevens, 2 Coll. 20.

LONDON, MAY 23, 1846.

We regret the rejection of the Charitable Trusts Bill, which took place in the House of Lords last Monday, not on our own account, as we are neither trustees nor beneficiaries of any public charity, nor a retired Calcutta judge, nor a Vice-Chancellor, nor a Serjeant-at-law, nor even a Barrister of twelve years' standing. But we regret its rejection, because it leaves immense masses of property, that, in our humble opinion, ought to be protected and managed, totally without protection, and managed tant bien que mal.

The objections made to the bill by its noble and learned opponents, were of various characters. Lord Cottenham's principal objections (though he had many of detail) appears to have been to the creation of an expensive commission, while, according to him, the Court of Chancery is in a state of such superabundant strength, as to more than suffice for the work intended to be cast upon the Charity Commissioners. His Lordship meets the objection, that Chancery cannot be resorted to on account of the expensive character of its proceedings, by suggesting, that, for the cases intended to be included within the jurisdiction of the commissioners, no fees shall be taken in Chancery; but, under what arrangements of the machinery of Chancery he would have small charities administered, he does not explain.

Another objection is made by another noble and learned Lord, which we are very glad to see made, because it calls the attention of the public to a grievance having a far more extensive effect, than that of the non-existence of any practically controlling jurisdiction over the smaller charities. The Lord Chancellor, said Lord Campbell, "had confined himself almost entirely to that part of the bill which referred to small charities; and here he (Lord Campbell) allowed that some measure of this sort was necessary. Things ought not to remain as they were. It was a reproach to the law of this country. But it was not in the appointment of a commission of this sort that a remedy was to be found; it was in the reform of one of the regular tribunals of the country. It was allowed on all hands that his noble and learned friend (Lord Cottenham) had administered equity to the great satisfaction of everybody, and yet he had declared that the Court of Chancery was the best tribunal to which application could be made for the correction of abuses in charities. No doubt, it was an admirable tribunal; there was a careful investigation, a patient hearing, and justice was administered. The only objection was, the expense of litigation. The obvious remedy, then, was to diminish that expense. But charities were only specimens of what might be said of the Court of Chancery with regard to any small sums of money recoverable in equity. If a person had a legacy of 50l., to recover it by bill in equity would lead to a certain loss of a larger sum. The proper remedy, then, would be, to allow justice to be cheaply administered." Lord Campbell, therefore, objects to the Charitable Trusts Bill, not because the Court of Chancery can do the required work without alteration, but because he thinks the reform ought to proceed in the direction of reforming the machinery of Chancery itself, instead of supplying its admitted defect by the substitution of an assistant piece of machinery.

Now, if the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland means say, that an entire revision of the system and machinery of Chancery, for all purposes, should be effected, then, firstly, we should say, that we humbly dissent from his Lordship's view; and, secondly, we can wish him no pleasanter task for a vacation amusement, than to draw a general Chancery Reform Bill. But, if his Lordship merely means, as we conceive he does, that not only for administering charitable trusts, but for dealing according to the principles of equity, with all trust property of small amount, much public benefit might result from a simplification of Chancery procedure, then we perfectly agree with the noble and learned Lord's conclusion, and cannot too strongly express our desire,—a desire which we are satisfied is in unison with that of thousands of cestuis que trustent and a large portion of the Profession,—that his Lordship, or any other learned Lord possessing similar zeal, similar good intentions, and as indomitable a perseverance, would undertake to prepare a bill for adapting such machinery as the Court of Chancery already possesses, for applying the jurisdiction of equity to adjudicate in all matters of trust property of small amount.

Let us take an imaginable case of the inapplicability of the Court of Chancery, and the non-existence of any other tribunal, and consequently of the denial of justice, in matters of private trust property. Suppose a testator to bequeath a small personal property, partly consisting of money in the funds and partly of an unfinished literary work, among several children, with not very clear directions to one of them, in whom he has confidence, to complete his work, and some corresponding advantages to that one. Suppose some of the children daughters, and married: the share of one of them bequeathed to her for life, in terms which leave it doubtful whether it is to her separate use or not. As to the other married daughters, let their shares be clearly not to their separate use; and, as to all, suppose remainders to children, some of whom are infants. The testator directs a sale of his literary production in certain events, and, in certain others, a division of its profits, and appoints executors and trustees. The husband of one of the daughters whose shares are not given to their separate use becomes insolvent, and then the married daughters, whose shares are bequeathed to their separate use desire to purchase up the shares of the others. And, if they do not, no one will find it worth while to complete the work and realise its value; and, quæ assets, it will be lost. Now, suppose it, in the first place, not to be clear that the events in which the power of sale arises have taken place; it is sufficiently manifest that a state of confusion will exist, in which, to determine how a sale is to be carried into effect, who are sufficient conveying parties, and the like, will offer questions of so puzzling a character, that the trustees could never be advised to act, nor the purchaser to purchase, unless the first are prepared to run the risk of being called upon to refund at some future period the value of the whole, and the second to pay their money and get no title. And suppose, in the second place, the value of the whole matter in question to be 150*l.* or 200*l.*

The case that we are putting is not a wholly imaginary one, and is but a specimen of thousands more or less complex that occur yearly, in which property becomes valueless to families, to whom, small though it may be in amount, it is much by relation to their circumstances. It is needless to say that a suit in Chancery to obtain the direction of the court in such a case, would not merely be a foolish thing; it would be an impossible thing; for the fund would not be a sufficient security for the costs, and a prudent solicitor would not even undertake such a suit.

Now, what is the reason, in a case of this sort, of the disproportionate expense? The reason is this. There must be a bill framed in the usual way, setting forth all matters necessary to shew, upon the face of it, the title of the plaintiff and the ground of the conflicting claims. To this all the persons interested must be parties, as much as if the property at stake was many thousands. All the defendants must put in answers fully answering the bill; all must appear by separate counsel at a preliminary hearing, and all the counsel must be furnished with full briefs of the pleadings. There must be a decree for inquiries, if there are, as there always are in poor cases, any questions as to classes of claimants. There must be an inquiry before the Master, conducted in the usual manner; and, lastly, there must be a second hearing, with a repetition of all the array of counsel for all the different parties, to argue the claims of such parties.

Now, all that is really wanted in such a case is, firstly, to ascertain that all the persons who may be interested are before the court; and, secondly, to have the claims of all those persons properly presented to the court; and this might be done by a very simple and inexpensive process.

The first step might be the presentation of a very short petition, stating merely the fact that A. had died and made his will; accompanied by a copy of the will, and any other documents on the effect of which a decision was desired, and by a schedule of the persons or classes of persons claiming; it would state that the opinion of the court was desired on the rights of the parties, or that a decree for sale was desired, or it would shew whatever might be the relief desired. On this petition (which might be drawn by counsel or not as the parties should think fit, but which should not require to be opened by counsel in court) an order of course might be obtained, referring it to the Master to inquire into the matter of the petition, and to order accordingly. The Master should then have power to make the necessary inquiries, to ascertain that the proper parties were before the court; and having them all before him, to group them in classes, and to direct a hearing before him, at which each class should be represented. At that hearing the parties should be allowed to attend by counsel, care being taken, by proper rules as to costs, to limit the expense incurred in retaining counsel. The decision of the Master should be final, unless he thought fit to allow an appeal, which should not, however, go beyond one Judge of the court; and the Master should himself settle a special case for appeal, so as to confine it to the points absolutely necessary to be discussed. The party desiring the appeal should make a deposit, which, in the event of his failing, should go towards paying the costs of the other parties. If he succeeded, he should have back his deposit, and the fund should pay the costs. It would, of course, be essential to the working of such a scheme, that the Master's Office should be an open court.

We have no doubt that the ideas above thrown out will, in many of their parts, appear crude, and in many they will be thought hostile to the interests of the Profession. On the first point, we will merely observe, that they are obviously not offered as a complete system, but merely as the germs of a system. On the second, we would observe, first, that, even if the interests of the Profession were to be injured by any reform that should open the doors of equity to the poor, that would be no obstacle to its introduction; and, secondly, that a simplification of procedure which should render the jurisdiction of Chancery practically applicable for adjudicating between claimants where the amount of the fund varies from 100*l.* to 300*l.*, would be much more likely to double, than to diminish, the emoluments of Chancery practitioners.

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Mortgage of the Wife's Chattels Real.—Where husband and wife assign chattels real, by way of mortgage, to some shares in which the husband is entitled in right of his wife, while to others the wife is entitled for her separate use, and the mortgage-deed contains a proviso for redemption and re-assignment to the husband and wife, or either of them, their, his, or her executors, administrators, and assigns, on payment of the mortgage-money by the husband and wife, or either of them, their, his, or her executors or administrators, or any person or persons on their, his, or her behalf; with a power of sale, and a declaration that the surplus money, if any, arising from the sale, shall go to the husband or wife, their executors, administrators, or assigns, according to their respective interests; and the husband dies in the wife's lifetime, without having paid the mortgage-money: the mortgage does not amount to a complete reduction into possession, but the wife, according to the plain intention of the deeds, is entitled by survivorship to the equity of redemption. Clark v. Burgh, 2 Coll. 221.

Deed of Arrangement, securing to the Wife the Means of keeping up an Establishment of her own, in consideration of the Abandonment of Proceedings against the Husband.—If a deed of arrangement is executed by husband and wife, by which, in consideration of the discontinuance of a suit instituted by the wife for a divorce for cruelty, and of the waiver by the wife of other intended proceedings for obtaining a proper provision for herself and her children, and for the prevention of disputes, a leasehold house is assigned to trustees, for the accommodation of the wife and her children, as their residence, and by which a large annual sum of money is to be raised out of the real estates of the husband, and paid to the wife for her sole and absolute use, independently of her husband, who has other estates of greater value, and by which it is declared that the wife shall, out of such sum, keep up an establishment in the house so assigned, for the benefit of herself and her children, in such a manner as she shall think fit, and pay certain other expenses of herself and her children; and that, if she shall not require the whole of that sum, the surplus shall be paid to the husband; and that the husband shall be at liberty to partake of the benefit of the establishment so long as he conforms to the spirit and intention of the deed; such deed is not illegal or ineffectual. It is not contrary to the policy of the law; for it does not even amount to a deed of separation; and though it considerably alters the original relation between husband and wife, yet that is the case with even the ordinary provisions for the separate use of the wife. Nor is it void for want of a consideration, for discontinuance and waiver of proceedings constitute a sufficient consideration. Jodrell v. Jodrell, 15 Law J. 17—M. R.

IMPLICATION.

Implied Estate during Widowhood in Real and Personal Property.—Where a testator devises real estate to his sons, but wills that they be not put in possession so long as his wife shall remain his widow; and (in varied but substantially the same terms) wills that different portions of his personal estate be divided between his children on her death or second marriage; his widow will take an estate by implication in the real and personal property for her own benefit during widowhood, although the will contains a direction, that, in a particular event, (such as that of her giving up a farm which the testator occupied), the devisees of his real estate shall pay her a certain annual sum out of it during widowhood. Cockshott v. Cockshott, 10 Jur. 41—V. C. B.

See "Legacies."

INJUNCTION.

Payment of East India Bonds.—The Court of Chancery has power to restrain the East India Company from paying over the principal and interest secured upon East India bonds to a person who has fraudulently got possession of the same. Glaes v. Marshall, 15 Law J. 25—V. C. E.

Injunction Bill by a Lessee of a Bed of Coals against another Lessee thereof.—Where a party claims to be lessee of a bed of coal, but another party also claims to be lessee thereof under a prior lease granted by an ancestor of the lessor of the first-mentioned party, and is working such bed of coal accordingly, the Court of Chancery will not interfere in behalf of the former to restrain the latter from working the coal, especially where the bill for an injunction is not filed till a year after the latter commenced working. Haigh v. Jaggard, 2 Coll. 231.

INSURANCE.

Insurance on the Life of a married Woman by an Assignee of her reversionary Interest.—Where husband and wife assign the reversionary interest of the wife in personal property to secure a debt of the husband, and the creditor afterwards insures the life of the wife in a sum less than the debt, without the knowledge of the debtor or his wife, and receives that sum on her death in her husband's lifetime, the husband is not entitled to have that amount set off against the mortgage debt; for, although the creditor had an insurable interest in the life of the wife, so that the policy was not void under the stat. 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, for want of such an interest, yet his right was only to effect a policy which should guarantee him against the loss he might have sustained if the wife had survived the husband; and, as the risk ceased when she died in the lifetime of her husband, the guarantee then became satisfied. Henson v. Blackwell, 4 Hare, 434.

LEASE—See "Power."

LEASEHOLDS FOR LIVES.

Expenses of renewing a Life which dropped during the possession of a prior Tenant for Life.—Where lands holden under a lease for four lives, renewable upon payment of a fine, are devised upon trust for a person for life, such person filling up the lives as often as any shall fall in; and, subject to such life interest, upon trust to let and set the same; and, after paying the rents and land-tax and keeping full the lives, to pay the residue to another person for life; and, after his decease, to sell the estate, and divide the proceeds among certain other persons; and the first tenant for life dies insolvent, without having filled up a life which had dropped, and then another life drops, two new lives must be substituted; but the second tenant for life is only bound to pay the expenses of putting in a new life in the room of the life dropped during his possession of the estate; and the expenses of putting in a new life in the room of the life which dropped during the possession of the first tenant for life must be borne by the corpus of the estate, with interest thereon, at the rate of 5l. per cent., from the death of the nominee whose life first dropped to the death of the other nominee. Wadley v. Wadley, 2 Coll. 11.

See "Vendor and Purchaser."

LEGACY.

Whether the word "Legacies" includes Annuities.—In its usual acceptation, the word "legacy" means something distinct and different from an "annuity." It may, indeed, be used in a generic sense, to denote an annuity; but it will not be construed to have that sense where there is anything which indicates that it was not used in that sense. And hence, where a testator directs that all legacies which he shall give by his will or any codicil, shall, unless he shall expressly direct the contrary, be paid immediately after his decease out of his personal estate, but, if that shall be insufficient, he charges his real estate with the deficiency; and then he gives certain annuities, which he charges on his real estate; and, by a codicil, he directs certain other annuities to be paid out of his personal, or from the income of his estates: the annuities are not included in the word "legacies;" for, by directing the legacies to be paid immediately after his decease, he shews, that, in using the word "legacies," he did not mean to include annuities. And as, in such case, the word "legacies" does not include annuities, and as the testator expressly charges the former annuities on his real estate, but directs the latter to be paid out of his personal estate, or from the income of his estates, the latter are not deemed to be charged on his real estate. Cornfield v. Wyndham, 2 Coll. 184.

Specific Legacies—Misdescription of Stock.—In order that legacies of stock should be deemed specific, it is not necessary that the stock should be correctly described, either in point of amount or as regards the names in which it is described to be standing, where there is no ground for reasonable doubt as to the subject of such legacies. And a legacy may be specific, though it is only of a portion of one aggregate amount of stock, and is given under a general designation of a certain amount of a certain kind of stock, without reference to the particular aggregate amount of such stock belonging to the testator. As, where a testator having 2630*l.* 3*s.* 3*d.* per Cents, without referring to that amount of stock, gives 1000*l.* 3*d.* per Cents to one person, and 1800*l.* 3*d.* per Cents to another, these may be specific legacies. Warren v. Postlethwaite, 2 Coll. 116.

Whether double Legacies are bequeathed.—Where a testator, after bequeathing a sum of money to each of the grandchildren, by name, of one of his brothers, directs his executors to pay a like sum (naming it) to each child that may be born to either of the children of either of his brothers lawfully begotten, to be paid to each of them on his or her attaining the age of twenty-one years; the grandchildren, who are mentioned by name as legatees, are not entitled to double legacies. Early v. Benbow, 10 Jur. 169—V. C. B.

Uncertainty.—Where a legacy was bequeathed to a person, and, in the event of her death without children, to her heirs and nearest relations of a certain relative of hers (De W.), of the De W. blood, the gift over was held void for uncertainty. Yearwood v. Yearwood, 10 Jur. 151—M. R.

Interest on a Legacy—Maintenance.—Where a testator bequeaths a legacy to his eldest child, to be paid on his attaining the age of twenty-one years, and the residue of his estate to his younger children, and then provides for the maintenance of all the children generally, without specifying the fund out of which they are to be maintained, and without indicating that the legacy given to the eldest son is to be separated from the rest of the personal estate until the time of payment arrives; the eldest son is not entitled to interest on his legacy, but, until that period, the whole personal estate remains as one fund, out of which all the children are to be maintained, without reference to their respective fortunes. Donovan v. Needham, 10 Jur. 150—M. R.

Survivorship of a Share.—Where a testator bequeaths to several persons one aggregate sum of money, and then directs that the interest shall be paid to them in equal shares during their lives, and that the principal shall be placed in the funds, in trust for them or the survivors or survivor of them; and that nothing but their receipts shall be a discharge; and that the principal, after their deaths, shall go in equal parts to the surviving children, as they arrive at the age of twenty-one; and one of these persons dies without issue; the share of that one does not go to the residuary legatee, but the survivors take the whole, for their lives, as tenants in common; the true meaning of the gift over being, that, after the death of all the legatees, the principal is to go to the aggregate class of surviving children; and not that, after their respective deaths, their respective shares are to go to their respective surviving children. Minton v. Cave, 10 Jur. 86—V. C. E.

Vested, and not dependent on the Legatee's surviving their Parent—Implied Gift, as well as a Power.—Where a testator gives stock to trustees, upon trust to pay the dividends to another person for life, and, after her decease, to pay both principal and interest to and amongst her children, as she shall by deed or will direct; but, if she shall leave no child living at her decease, or all die before a certain age, then over; and both of them attain that age, but one dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, one-half of the fund will belong to the surviving child, and the other to the representatives of the deceased child, though the power be not exercised; for, in this case, there is a gift by implication as well as a power; and, although the limitation over might seem to imply that children who should survive their parent were the only objects of the testator's bounty, yet that implication is counterbalanced by the implication arising from the power to appoint by deed as well as by will. Moreover, in the absence of a perfectly clear expression of such an intention, it would be irrational to suppose that the testator could intend, that, if the children of the tenant for life, after attaining the given age, should die, leaving families, neither of the families should take anything, merely because those children did not survive their parent. Besides, in the case supposed, the condition on which the property was to go over did not happen. Faulkner v. Lord Wynford, 16 Law J. 8—V. C. W.

Necessity for surviving a prior taker.—Where a testator gives the dividends of stock to a person for life, and, after such person's decease, he gives the principal to several children, whom he names individually, and all and every other the child and children of the same parents that might be living at the decease of the tenant for life; the same to be transferred and paid to them respectively, in equal shares, on their respectively attaining twenty-one; those whom he names individually take absolute vested interests at twenty-one, though they die in the lifetime of the tenant for life; for, according to the true construction of such a gift, it is a gift to those whom the testator names individually, whether living at the decease of the tenant for life, or not, and to all others who might come into existence and be living at that time. Roberts v. Burder, 2 Coll. 130. For, the condition of being alive at that time forms part of the description of the after-born children; but it is not even grammatically connected with the children individually named; and it is a kind of condition, which, so far from being extended to persons to whom it does not literally apply, is one the application of which the courts will endeavour to avoid, even where it literally does apply.

Vested Interest in a Legacy, subject to be devolved in the event of not surviving a Parent.—Although a court of equity will lay hold of any passage or expression which will assist it in putting such a construction on a will, that a limitation in favour of children may not be dependent on their surviving their parents or a prior taker, yet, where the language of the will expressly and unequivocally makes the interests of the children, or even of some of them and not of others, dependent on that contingency, and there is nothing in the will to indicate a contrary intention; there, the court must give effect to the intention so expressed, however antecedently improbable it may be that such was really the testator's intention, and whatever hardship may be thereby occasioned. Thus, where a testator directs his trustees to set apart, out of his residuary personal estate and the proceeds of the sale of his real estate, a sufficient sum to produce an annuity for his widow, and directs that they shall stand possessed of the residue during her lifetime, and of the whole after her decease, upon trust to pay and divide the same unto and equally between and amongst all his children as and when they shall severally and respectively attain the age of twenty-one years, and to their several and respective executors, administrators, and assigns; but, in regard to such of his children who had already attained the age of twenty-one years, he directs that the shares of such his children shall be paid to them respectively at the expiration of twelve months after the decease of his wife; with a limitation over in favour of their issue, in the event of the decease of any or either of his said children, before he, she, or they, or either of them shall have received or become possessed of their divisional share as aforesaid; and with benefit of survivorship between and among such children, in case of their not having issue who shall attain twenty-one; the children who had attained twenty-one at the date of the will take vested interests, liable to be divested in the event of their decease before the time fixed for the actual payment of their shares; and the children who had not attained twenty-one at the date of the will take vested interests on their attaining twenty-one not liable to be divested. Rummell v. Gillow, 15 Law J. 35—V. C. W.

Interest on such a Legacy before Devestment.—Persons who take vested interests in personal estate liable to be divested are entitled to the interest which accrues from the period when they take vested interests until the divestment happens. Id.

Necessity for surviving a prior taker—Lapse to Heir of Legacy of Produce of Sale of Real Estate.—Where a testator, after directing the conversion of real estate, gives the proceeds to children of a person (without naming them) that are living at such person's death, "in the following manner;" and then he mentions the shares which some, whom he names, are to take; the shares in the unconverted real estate of those who die in their parent's lifetime will not pass to their representatives, but, if the will contains no residuary devise, will lapse to the heir-at-law, who will take them as personal estate. Hatfield v. Pryme, 2 Coll. 204.

Giving over of accruing shares—Necessity for surviving in order to take a gift over.—Where a testator bequeaths personal property upon trust for a family of children who shall be living at a particular period for life, and, after the death of any of them, upon trust to stand possessed of a proportionate share for the issue of such child or children so dying, absolutely; but, in case of such child or children dying without leaving issue, then, as to the proportionate share of the child so dying, upon trust for the other children then living, and the issue of such of them as may be then dead; with a limitation over of "the share, as well original as accruing," of the last surviving child, in case none of the children shall leave any issue; in such case, the accruing shares of the children who live till the specified period, and then die without issue, do not go over to the surviving children with the original shares, but belong to the representatives of the children so dying without issue; and the issue of any child who lives till the specified period and then dies, must be living at the decease of any other child who dies without issue, in order to take a share of the original share of such child so dying without issue. Macgregor v. Macgregor, 2 Coll. 192.

Period to which the word "surviving" refers.—Where a testator bequeaths to a person a sum of money "after marriage," and, in a subsequent part of his will, (whether in language creating a trust, or merely amounting to a recommendation, is not material), he expresses a hope or desire, that, if she die without issue, then, on the decease of her husband and herself, her fortune should revert to her "surviving brothers," and the brothers survive her, but die in the lifetime of her husband; the property will belong to her husband absolutely, as her personal representative; because the word "surviving" refers to the brothers surviving both her and her husband; and because the money is bequeathed to her absolutely in the first instance, and, the trust (if the subsequent words amounted to a trust) in derogation of that absolute bequest having failed, the bequest stands as if no such trust were superadded. Eaton v. Barker, 2 Coll. 124.

See "Survivorship."

LEGAL ESTATE—See "Married Women."

MAINTENANCE—See "Legacy," Case 5.

Apportionment of a Rent-charge.—Where a testator gives annuities charged on land for the maintenance of younger children up to the time that the eldest son shall attain twenty-one, each of such annuities to be paid on the birthdays of the respective children; an apportioned part of an annuity is due for the interval extending from the birthday of a younger child which next precedes the time of the eldest son's attaining his majority, up to that time. Sheppard v. Wilson, 4 Hare, 395.

There is another case on the subject of maintenance, namely, Williams v. Edwards, (2 Coll. 176); but it did not seem necessary to abstract it.

MARRIED WOMEN.

Devise in Fee to Separate Use, with Prohibition of selling or incumbering.—Real estate may be devised for the separate use of a married woman, although it be devised to her in fee; and, if a prohibition of selling, charging, mortgaging, or incumbering be annexed to such a devise, whether such prohibition is confined to the period of coverture or expressed indefinitely, and whether it precedes or follows the words relating to the separate use, she will be disabled during the coverture from making any sale, charge, mortgage, or incumbrance, to take effect against her estate during the coverture. Baggett v. Meux, 1 Coll. 138, affirmed by L. C., 10 Jur. 213.

Limitation to Trustees "in Trust for" a married woman, for her Separate Use, giving her the Legal Estate.—Where land is limited, by a marriage settlement, to trustees and their heirs, to the use of the intended wife until the marriage, and after the solemnization thereof, "in trust for" her for life, for her own sole and separate use, independent of her husband, his debts, control, or enjoyment; the trustees do not take the legal estate during the life of the wife, but the use is executed in her by the express words of the Statute of Uses, and the subsequent words constitute a condition which is void at law. Williams v. Waters, 14 Mee. & W. 166.

MISTAKE.

Substituting a new Charge, without extinguishing the former one.—Where, by a deed of settlement before marriage, a charge is created in favour of the father of the lady, to the amount of the portion given her by him, and afterwards a deed is executed and a fine levied, with the view of putting an end to the settlement and of barring such charge, but without having that effect, and, by the second deed, another charge to the same amount is created in favour of the lady, who takes a less beneficial interest, in other respects, under the second deed than under the first, and such second charge appears, upon the face of the deed, to have been intended to be a substitute for the charge created by the first deed; both charges will, nevertheless, be established: the first, because it was never barred; and the second, because the wife, especially after the lapse of very many years since the execution of the deed, cannot be deprived of the charge which she had stipulated for by the second deed, merely because her husband did not take the proper means to extinguish the first charge. Farr v. Sheriffe and Dykes v. Farr, 15 Law J. 89—V. C. W.

Signing & Consent to an Exchange under a Mistake.—Where a proprietor of land in a parish about to be inclosed under an act of Parliament, signs a consent to exchange certain pieces of ground belonging to him, designated therein by numbers corresponding to the numbers by which the same are distinguished in a map and terrier used for the purposes of the inclosure and previously inspected by his agent, and the commissioner thereupon allots those pieces of ground in exchange, and such exchange is approved of by the agent of the proprietor, and the allottee of one of them is let into possession, and begins to exercise acts of ownership, with the consent of the agent; the proprietor has no right to repudiate the consent so signed by him and the exchange made in consequence thereof, and to ask for an injunction to restrain the commissioner from making his award accordingly, upon the ground, that, before the consent was drawn up, he (the proprietor) had instructed his agent not to permit the exchange of that piece of ground except for other land of the like nature; and that he, (the proprietor), on signing such consent, concluded that it did not comprise that piece of ground, when, in reality, it did comprise it, and the same was allotted in exchange for land of a different nature; the restriction imposed on the agent not having been communicated by him to the commissioner. For the proprietor must be the sufferer by the neglect of his agent, and by his own negligence in not inquiring what property was designated by the numbers in the consent before signing it. And, in such case, if the proprietor brings an action of ejectment for the piece of ground in question, he may be restrained, by an injunction, from proceeding with it. Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld, 12 Cl. & Fin. 248.

See "Legacy."

MORTGAGE.

Liability in respect of Shares in a Banking Company after Payment of the Mortgage Debt and Requisition to re-transfer the Shares.—Where shares in a banking company are transferred by way of mortgage, and afterwards the debt is paid off, and the mortgagor and mortgagee apply to the directors of the company to have the shares re-transferred, the mortgagee becomes a trustee for the mortgagor from that time, and, as such, entitled to an indemnity in equity from his cestui que trust in respect of calls on other payments required to be made during the interval between the requisition to re-transfer the shares and the actual re-transfer thereof. Phene v. Gillon, 15 Law J. 65—V. C. W. In this case it was agreed that the mortgagee should not be liable for any calls or other payments in respect of the shares; but the decision does not appear to have been in any way grounded on that circumstance.

Priority of subsequent Mortgages of Stock over Assignment for the Benefit of Creditors—Notice.—Where a person, who has a reversionary interest in stock standing in the names of trustees, bequeaths the same to another person, and appoints one of the trustees her executor, and the legatee made a general assignment of his estate and effects to the other trustee for the benefit of his creditors, of which no notice is given to the executor, who had not assented to the bequest, and the legatee afterwards assigns the stock by way of mortgage, of which notice is given to the executor, the last assignee has the priority; because notice to the executor is necessary where the bequest has not been assented to by him, and constructive notice to the trustees alone, by means of the actual information of the one who is the first assignee, is not sufficient, at least where the other trustee who is also executor, had no actual information of the first assignment in any way. Nor did the pendency of a suit for carrying into effect the trusts of the first assignment constitute notice of the assignment of the stock in question, if there was no specific claim made in that suit to the legacy in question. Holt v. Dowell, 4 Hare, 446; 15 Law J. 14.

NOTICE—See "Mortgage."

PARTNERSHIP.

Payment of Interest by surviving Partners, one of whom is the Executor of the deceased Partner—Statute of Limitations.—Where money is deposited with a banking firm, and one of the partners dies, and appoints another of the partners his executor, subsequent payments of interest by the bank, even under its original name or style, are not to be deemed payments by the executor of the deceased partner in his character of executor, and will not keep alive the debt as against the real or personal estate of the deceased partner, so as to prevent the Statute of Limitations from barring the same as against such estate. Way v. Bassett, 15 Law J. 1—V. C. W.

PERPETUITY.

Power to cut down Timber until there should be a Tenant in Tail of full Age, and to invest the Proceeds in Land.—Where an estate is devised in strict settlement, and the will, after restraining each tenant for life from cutting timber and underwood, except for repairs, declares that it shall be lawful for the executors, at any time, until some person entitled in possession to an estate tail or some greater estate shall attain the age of twenty-one years, to enter and cut timber and underwood, and directs them from time to time, with the consent and approbation of the persons entitled to the rents and profits of the estate, to invest the residue of the proceeds arising from such timber and underwood, after payment of debts and legacies, in the purchase of lands, to be settled to the same uses as the estate devised; the power, whether it be imperative or permissive only, is void, as a whole; because timber stands upon the same footing as the annual rents and profits of an estate in regard to the rule against accumulation beyond a certain period and the rights of a tenant in tail; and if such a trust as that above mentioned were sustained, it would derogate from the rights of each infant tenant in tail, and there might be an accumulation for ages, inasmuch as the event of there being a tenant in tail of the age of twenty-one might not happen for hundreds of years, perhaps never. And not only is the power void as a whole, but it cannot be apportioned so as to be supported so far as it does not transgress the limits allowed by law. Farrand v. Wilson, 4 Hare, 344, and 15 Law J. 41, abstracted from the latter report.

Although in this case the learned judge held that the power could not be apportioned, yet he said that he had the strongest impression, that, if the mind of the testator be, that successive acts shall be done from year to year, commencing with the year after his death, and if each of these acts be complete in itself, (as felling timber, and converting the proceeds into land upon the use of a settlement), and if each act is an exact fulfilment, as far as it goes, of the intention of the testator, both as to the thing done and the parties to be benefited by it, there is no ground why the court should not sustain such a power, as long as the exercise of it, determined by events as they stand at the death of the testator, will not be affected by the law against perpetuities, and should not hold the power void only for the excess. But he did not venture to act upon that opinion, as, by so doing, he considered that he should be contravening the language of other cases, particularly that of Ware v. Polhill, 17 Ves. 257. Ib., 15 Law J., 50, 51.

See "Remoteness."

PORTIONS.

Right of the Owner of Land charged with Portions to have them raised before they are payable.—Where real estate is limited for a term of years, upon trust, out of the rents, or by mortgage or sale, to raise a certain sum varying in amount according to the number of the children, and to be paid at a certain age or on marriage, with interest at 5l. per cent. in the meantime for their maintenance, the eldest son is not entitled to have the portions raised and invested, and his estate discharged, before any of the portions are payable; because younger children ought not to be deprived of the security of the land, or be obliged to take the lower rate of interest in the funds. And, for the same reason, the eldest son is not entitled to have the portion of the youngest child raised and invested, when the portions of the elder children are payable, but before the portion of the youngest is payable. Sheppard v. Wilson, 4 Hare, 392.

LONDON, MAY 30, 1846.

AN important addition has recently been made to the law of copyright by the Court of Exchequer, in its judgment in Chappell v. Purday, (14 Mee. & W. 303). Upon the facts of the case two questions were raised: first, whether, at common law, a foreigner residing abroad, and composing a work, has a copyright in England; and, secondly, whether such foreign author or his assignee has such a right by virtue of the English statutes. The question, whether copyright existed at common law, will be found discussed in the great cases of Millar v. Taylor (4 Burr. 2303) and Donaldson v. Beckett, (Id. 2408; 2 Bro. P. C. 129). In the former of these, it was held by Lord Mansfield, Mr. Justice Aston, and Mr. Justice Willes, that it did exist; and, in the latter, the majority of the judges were of the same opinion; but they held also, that it was taken away by the statute of Anne. The majority were likewise of opinion, that, by the common law, the author had the sole right of printing and publishing in perpetuity. If, therefore, the common law right extended to foreigners, they would, unless also affected by the statutes, have now a greater right than English subjects.

The rule, that, at common law, an author had the sole right of printing and publishing his work, is so vague, that a foreigner might or might not be included; and, in order to decide the first question raised in Chappell v. Purday, it became necessary to ascertain precisely what was meant by the term "common law." In the cases we have referred to, the Court of Exchequer have come to the conclusion, that the right did not extend to foreigners. They were "all of opinion that no such right exists in a foreigner at the common law, but that it is the creature of the municipal law of each country, and that in England it is altogether governed by the statutes which have been passed to create and regulate it, as in France it must be governed by the law of that country; but such a law has no extra-territorial power, and cannot be enforced beyond the limits of the estate. Admitting, therefore, that, by the law of France, no one can, against or without the consent of the author, make or print any copy of his work at any time or in any place, no right can be claimed in this country as founded upon such a law, nor can any right be claimed here except what can be supported by the law of this country. The subjects of this country are not bound to obey such a law of France, nor the courts of this country to enforce it. It follows, that a British subject may, at the common law, freely print and publish in Great Britain any number of copies of a French work, without being exposed to an action at the suit of the French author, whose exclusive privilege, founded upon the French law, is limited by the French territory; and, indeed, if this were not so, the attempt to establish international copyright by treaty would have been altogether unnecessary."

The expression, that no such right exists in the foreigner at common law, but that it is the creature of the municipal law of each country, and that in England it is altogether governed by the statutes which have been passed to create and regulate it, seems at variance with the doctrine in the old cases, that the right did exist at common law; and we think the recent decision, as far as regards the first question, does, in reality, conflict with those cases. By the common law, the judges who decided them must have meant the common municipal law, for none other was applicable to the case before them. And, although copyright be the creature of the municipal law of each country, it does not necessarily follow that it cannot exist in a foreigner. The right of property in goods or other personal estate in this country, the right to sue on a contract made here, are both of them, we apprehend, creatures of the common law, and yet a foreigner may acquire such rights without having ever been in this country. That copyright is a creature of the municipal law, proves nothing: the same law which gives the right to a subject, may prescribe that the foreigner may have it also; for it cannot be denied, that, by the municipal law, a foreigner may have some rights.

The Court of Exchequer appear to have confounded municipal law with statute law. They say that copyright is the creature of the municipal law of each country, and in England is altogether governed by the statutes which have been passed to create and regulate it, and, therefore, it cannot exist in a foreigner; but this is beside the first of the questions then before them. That question was, whether the right which existed independently of the statutes, and was the creature, so to express it, of the unwritten municipal law, extended to foreigners. Do they deny that such a right ever existed? It would seem so; for, instead of deciding the question arising upon it, they have held that the common law does not give to the foreigner any interest in the right which has been created and regulated by the statutes; for such their judgment will be found to be on an attentive perusal. And the distinction is important; for if the foreigner before the statutes had the same right as an English subject, that right, as we said before, must either still exist, or the statutes must be held to have applied to the right of the foreigner as well as the right of the subject, and to have created and regulated, to use the words of the Court of Exchequer, a new right for the one as well as the other.

We have made these observations because the court seems somewhat hastily to have dismissed the branch of the question to which they relate, and not, as they say, feeling any difficulty upon it, to have founded their judgment upon reasoning which will not bear the test of examination.

The second question they had to decide was, whether a foreigner residing abroad and publishing a work there has a copyright in it in this country by the statute law. "If," they say, "a judicial construction had been put on these statutes by a direct and deliberate decision of any court, we should feel bound by it; but, supposing for the present that there is no such decision, and that the question comes now to be considered for the first time, we should feel no difficulty as to the proper construction to be put upon these statutes. They were passed for the encouragement of learning and the arts, by ensuring to authors, artists, and inventors the reward of their labours. In their language the arts are general, but prima facie it must be intended that a British Legislature means only to protect British subjects, and to foster and encourage British industry and talent; and, therefore, when statutes of the United Kingdom speak of authors and inventors, they mean authors and inventors being subjects of and residents in the United Kingdom, or, at least, subjects by birth or residence, and do not apply to foreigners resident abroad."

This seems very bad reasoning. The encouragement of learning and the arts surely embraces a wider scope than the protection of British subjects, and fostering and encouraging British industry and talent. The Barons of her Majesty's Exchequer appear to be behind the rest of the world, and not, judicially at least, to be aware that British industry and talent is not necessarily fostered by protection. What follows, though technical, is, perhaps, more to the purpose; "and," they continue, "adverting principally to the statutes of the 8 Anne, and 54 Geo. 3, their provisions clearly refer to such works as are first published in Great Britain or the United Kingdom, from which first publication the time begins to run within which an entry is (under the 2nd section of the former statute, and under the 5th section of the latter) to be made at Stationers' Hall, in order to the recovery of penalties, and within twelve months after which publication copies are to be delivered by the publisher to the British Museum and other libraries." And, therefore, they conclude, upon the construction of the statutes alone, that a foreign author has no copyright.

The judgment then proceeds to examine into the cases which had been decided upon the subject, the result of which seemed to be, that, if a foreign author, not having published abroad, first publishes in England, he may have the benefit of the statutes, (which, we may observe in passing, is at variance with the protection of British industry), but that no case had decided, that, if the author first published abroad, he could afterwards have the benefit of it by first publishing here. It then adverts to the 4 Geo. 3, c. 107, and the 2 Vict. c. 59, International Copyright Act; but, as it is admitted that the argument to be derived from these is not very cogent, we need not further notice it.

Upon the whole, then, say the court, "We think it doubtful, whether a foreigner not resident here can have an English copyright at all; and we think he certainly cannot, if he has first published his work abroad before any publication in England." Such is the decision of the Court of Exchequer, which, as to the last branch of it, however, is now of little importance, as the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 59, the former International Copyright Act, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 12, the present, give her Majesty power, by order in Council, to direct that authors of works first published in foreign countries shall have a copyright therein in this country, and enact, that such authors shall not have any copyright otherwise than such as they may become entitled to under those acts.

Designed to combine the Advantages of an Abridgment of, and an Index to, the recent Cases, and of an original Statement of the Points established thereby.

POWER OF LEASING.

Right of Re-entry not given in the manner required by the Power.—Where a power of leasing requires that the usual covenants shall be inserted in the lease, with a condition of re-entry "for non-performance of the covenants therein to be contained," and the lease contains a general covenant to repair and keep in repair, but, by the clause of re-entry, the right to re-enter is not, in general terms, in case the lessee shall not repair, but in case the lessee shall not repair "within six calendar months next after notice;" there, the lease is not in compliance with the power. Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Burrough, 6 Adol. & Ell. 229.

Comprising in the Lease Lands not within the Power.—If a lease, under a power of leasing at the accustomed rents and heriots, purports to demise, at one entire rent, lands not within the power, together with the lands which are within the power, the lease is bad as to the lands within the power, although the rent and heriots are in proportion to the rent and heriots previously reserved on all the lands; but, against a party claiming as heir to the lessor, the lease is good as to the lands which are not within the power, and of which the lessor is seised in fee. Doe d. Lord Egremont v. Stephens, 6 Adol. & Ell. 208.

Comprising in one Lease Lands before let separately.—In the case of a lease under a power of demising, for lives or for years determinable on lives, any part of the lands "usually so leased," the joining of lands in the same lease which were usually let separately is not at variance with the power, for the words "usually so leased" apply to the duration of the lease. Id.

Clause as to Waste.—Where a lease is made under a power which provides that no clause shall be contained in the lease allowing the lessee to commit waste, and the lease contains a stipulation that the lessee shall build a new house, and that he may pull down an outhouse, and use the materials in building the new house; such a stipulation, in the absence of proof that this conversion would diminish the value of the property, does not amount to a clause giving power to the lessee to commit waste, within the meaning of the leasing power. Id.

What are "usual and reasonable Covenants."—Where a power of leasing provides that the lease shall contain all "usual and reasonable covenants," the general rule is to determine the question of what are usual covenants by reference to the lease in existence at the date of the power. And where a lease of copyholds, which was in existence at the date of a power of leasing those copyholds, or, if that be lost, a lease immediately preceding that lease, contains a stipulation that the lessee shall do suit to a certain mill belonging to the lord of the manor, by grinding his corn there, and the lease made in execution of the power does not contain a similar stipulation, it is void. On the other hand, if a lease of other property, even within the same manor, which was in existence at the date of the power, and was created by the author of the power, does not contain such a stipulation, the lease made in execution of the power will not be avoided by the absence of a similar stipulation, although the leases prior to the last do contain that stipulation; at all events, where they comprise other property besides that which was comprised in the last lease. Id.

RAILWAY SHARES.

Right of Legatee of Railway Shares to new Shares, and Liability to pay the Calls.—Where a testator, possessed of a certain number of railway shares, bequeaths a part of them, and declares that the legacy thereof shall not be deemed specific, so as to be capable of ademption, and that if he should not have a sufficient quantity of such shares to answer such legacy, the deficiency shall be raised out of his estate, for the benefit of the legatee thereof; and, after the death of the testator, new shares are allotted to the executors in respect of the original shares; the legacy of the original shares is specific, except in regard to the two particulars mentioned by the testator; and, therefore, the income of such shares passes with them, and the new shares belong to the legatee of the original shares, but subject to the liability to pay the calls in respect of the original shares. Jacques v. Chambers, 10 Jur. 151—V. C. B.

REMOTENESS.

Limitation over on Failure of Issue—Force of the word "Survivor."—Where a testator bequeaths the residue of his personal estate to two persons, equally to be divided between them, in case they are both living at the time of his decease; but, if either of them should happen to die before him, or at any time after, without issue, then he bequeaths the share of the one so dying without issue to the survivor of them: in such case, if one dies in the lifetime of the other, without having had issue, the latter will take the whole; for the word "survivor" is here used in its proper sense, and not in the sense of the word "other," and the limitation over is not void for remoteness. Turner v. Frampton, 10 Jur. 25—V. C. B.

See "Perpetuity."

SETTLEMENT.

Apparently Voluntary, but in reality for valuable Consideration, and good against Creditors.—A deed which is apparently voluntary may be shewn by extrinsic evidence to have been made for valuable consideration, and may be supported, as such against creditors. And where a will is invalid as to real estate, and of doubtful validity as to personal estate, for want of being attested, but the heir-at-law and next of kin agree to give up part of the property in order to effectuate the intentions of the testator in favour of a married woman, upon condition that the property so given up shall be settled upon her and her children, and it is so settled accordingly; the settlement is founded on valuable consideration, and, though it be executed shortly before the bankruptcy of the husband, it is good against his creditors. Pott v. Todhunter, 2 Coll. 76. In this case the agreement as to the settlement was made three years before the husband's bankruptcy.

SHIP.

Right to a Cargo disputed between the Charterers and the Owners of a Ship.—Where a ship is chartered to take from the factor of the charterers a certain cargo, and the factor fails to procure more than a small proportion of the intended cargo, and leaves the port, and the master of the ship, being also a partowner thereof, after waiting a reasonable time, (a month, for instance), and seeing no probability of obtaining any more from the factor, completes the cargo by his own exertions and at his own expense, the charterers are not entitled to that part of the cargo which was procured by him without the assistance of the factor, and to which the master claims to be entitled on behalf of himself and the other owners of the vessel. Lidgett v. Williams, 4 Hare, 466.

SOLICITOR AND CLIENT—See "Debtor and Creditor."

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Bond by a Tenant for Life with the Reversion in Fee in himself, conditioned for granting a Lease "subject to such Covenants as were usually inserted in Leases by him."—Where a tenant for life, with remainder to his sons in tail, with the reversion in fee in himself, has a power of granting leases for ninety-nine years in possession, and he, when all probability of his having issue has ceased, and when he may reasonably consider himself to be virtually tenant in fee simple, gives a bond conditioned for the granting, upon the expiration of a subsisting lease, a fresh lease for ninety-nine years, at a certain rent, "subject to such covenants as were usually inserted in leases by him," and, on the expiration of such subsisting lease, subsequently to his death without issue, the obligee is let into possession of the premises comprised in the bond, and for some years pays the rent specified in the bond; the court will regard the bond as evidence of a binding agreement for a lease on the terms therein mentioned, and will decree a complete specific performance of the agreement so made and partly performed, directing an inquiry as to what are the covenants which were usually inserted in leases granted by the obligor. Butler v. Powis, 2 Coll. 186.

STAMP.

Stamp on a Bond given to a Banking Company.—Where a bond is conditioned for the payment to a banking company of all such sums, not exceeding in the whole a certain amount, which from time to time shall be owing from the obligor to the company on the balance of his account current, together with such interest and commission as shall be due to the company; an ad-valorem stamp on the amount which is fixed as the limit to the advances to be secured is sufficient. For a bond so conditioned does not come within the clause in the stat. 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, sched., part 1, tit. "Bond," which imposes a stamp of 25*l*. on all bonds for the repayment of money lent, advanced, or paid, or which may become due on an account current, where the total amount of the money secured is uncertain and without limit; for, interest and commission do not come within the words "repayment of money lent, advanced, or paid, or due on an account current;" and the total amount of the principal is not "without limit." Frith v. Rotherham, 10 Jur. 208—Exch. By this case Dickson v. Cass (1 B. & Adol. 343) is overruled.

Stamp on a Transfer of a Mortgage for a Term, with a Conveyance of the Fee, as a new Security.—Where, on a transfer of a mortgage for a term, and a further advance, the reversion in fee is conveyed to the transferee of the mortgage, an ad-valorem stamp in respect of the further advance, and stamps for progressive duty, are not sufficient; for the conveyance of the fee creates a new security, in respect of which a deed stamp at the least is necessary. Brown v. Pegg, 6 Adol. & Ell. 1.

STATUTE 11 GEO. 4 & 1 WILL. 4, c. 47, s. 12.

Conveyance in Fee by a Tenant for Life under a Decree for Sale for Payment of Debts.—Where a testator devises real estate to trustees, upon trust to convey it, subject to his debts, to another person, on marriage, in strict settlement, and they convey it accordingly, such person is within the statute 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 47, s. 12, which enacts, that, where lands devised shall be liable to the payment of the debts of the testator, and "by such devise shall be vested in any person for life or other limited interest," with any gift over, which may not be vested, or may be vested in some person from whom a conveyance cannot be obtained, the Court of Chancery may direct such person to convey the whole interest to a purchaser; for, in the case supposed, the lands are vested in the prior taker mediately by devise, though immediately by a deed of settlement. Cheese v. Cheese, 15 Law J. 28—V. C. E.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Bar of Portions raisable by means of a Term.—The statute 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27, s. 4, has no application to a case between the trustee of a term created for raising portions and the cestui que trust; because the trustee does not hold adversely to the cestui que trust, but for their benefit. Young v. Lord Waterpark, 10 Jur. 1—L. C.

Arrears of an Annuity charged on Land.—Where an estate is devised to a person beneficially, subject to, and charged with, an annuity, he becomes liable to the annuitant, but does not stand in a fiduciary character with respect to him; so that such person is not a trustee within the 25th section of the Statute of Limitations, (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27); and, therefore, the annuitant is only entitled to recover six years' arrears of the annuity, according to the 42nd section of that act. Francis v. Grover, 15 Law J. 99—V. C. W.

Recovery of Court-rolls.—Where an ecclesiastical corporation, lords of a manor, grant a lease thereof for lives, and deposit the court-rolls with the lessee, and they are not delivered up after the expiration of the lease; the Statute of Limitations may be pleaded to a bill for the discovery and delivery of them, if there has been a lapse of more than twenty years from the expiration of the lease, without any intermediate acknowledgment of the right of the lords by the lessee or his representatives. Dean and Chapter of Wells v. Dodington, 2 Coll. 73.

See "Partnership."

STATUTE OF USES—See "Married Women."

SURVIVORSHIP.

Necessity of surviving a prior taker.—Where a testator devises real estate upon trust for a person for life, and, after her decease, upon trust to sell, and pay the proceeds among all his nephews and nieces, and the survivors and survivor of them, share and share alike, to be paid them respectively as they attain the age of twenty-one years or day of marriage; the property is divisible among those only who survive the tenant for life. Williams v. Tarrt, 2 Coll. 85.

See "Legacies."

TENANCY BY THE CURTESY

of an equitable Interest not precluded by a Dissaisin.—The possession of a cestui que trust under a settlement is the possession of the trustee, and gives the trustee a seisin of the estate, which is not interrupted by the death of the cestui que trust, but on that event immediately enures to give an equitable seisin to the person next entitled to the equitable freehold interest; and if such person is a married woman, and such equitable interest is in fee, her husband is entitled to an estate by the curtesy, even though the equitable seisin is almost immediately afterwards taken away by the adverse entry and possession of another person. Parker v. Carter, 4 Hare, 400.

TENANT FOR LIFE.

Right to get Stone out of Quarries.—Where an estate is devised in strict settlement, with liberty to each tenant for life in succession to get stone for buildings and repairs upon the premises, but for no other purpose whatsoever; and, in another part of the will, the testator recites that he had restrained, and he did thereby intend to restrain, each tenant for life from getting any stone upon the premises, or any part thereof, save for buildings and repairs; the former clause, considered apart from the latter, is purely enabling, so far as it goes, giving permission to get stone for certain purposes, even out of quarries not open at the testator's death; whereas, without such clause, the tenants for life would only have been entitled to take stone out of open quarries within a certain limit. But the latter passage shews that the former was intended to be restrictive as well as enabling; so that, whilst it enables the tenants for life to open quarries for the purposes specified, it prohibits them from taking stone, even from open quarries, for any other purposes than those. Ferrand v. Wilson, 15 Law J. 41—V. C. W.

TRUST.

Acknowledgment of a Trust the Origin of which is unknown.—If a person acknowledged that a sum of money deposited by him with another was held by him in trust for a third person, and, on the insolvency of the depositor, and on account of the loss occasioned thereby, the depositor gives to such third person a promissory note for that amount "for value received," and pays interest thereon up to the time of his decease, such third person will be entitled to that amount out of the personal estate of the depositor, the maker of the note, although the origin of the trust is unknown, provided there is no evidence to rebut the presumption of a trust; because the circumstances above mentioned make a prima facie case of trust, and this not being displaced or met, the proper conclusion is, to treat the note as given under a correct and well-founded belief, on the part of the maker thereof, that he had become liable in equity to make good the sum deposited and lost, and, therefore, as a note given for value. Burkitt v. Ransom, 10 Jur. 193—V. C. B.

TRUSTEE.

Right to a general Release on transferring the Trust Fund to the Cestui que Trust.—Where a trustee pays or transfers a trust fund to his cestui que trust, the cestui que trust is not bound to execute a general release by deed; but he is bound either to give the trustee a receipt not merely for the amount of the fund transferred or paid to him, but a receipt in full of all demands against the trustee in respect of the trust, or else to ask to have the accounts taken; and, therefore, if the cestui que trust refuses to give anything more than a receipt for the particular amount offered to be transferred or paid to him, and files a bill to have it so transferred or paid, the court will direct a general account to be taken, though no account be prayed, and no open unsettled account be suggested by the answer, unless the cestui que trust will receive the particular amount offered in full of all demands against the trustee in respect of the trust. Chadwick v. Heatley, 2 Coll. 137.

Indemnity against Liability before Loss.—A trustee who is threatened with an action, and is prima facie liable as legal owner, is not obliged to wait until such liability is actually enforced against him, before he can file a bill against his cestui que trust for an indemnity. Phene v. Gillon, 15 Law J. 65—V. C. W.

Negligence in allowing Exchequer Bills to remain in a Broker's Possession, undistinguished from other Property.—Where a trustee, who is directed by the instrument creating the trust to invest trust monies in the stocks or on real security, instructs his brokers, who also act to some extent as bankers, and had the confidence of the author of the trust, to invest the trust monies to a considerable amount in Exchequer bills, and, for more than a year, during the interval which elapses before a mortgage security is found and approved of, he allows the Exchequer bills to remain in the possession and under the control of the brokers, undistinguished from other property in their possession;

he is liable for the loss occasioned by the fraud of the brokers, if they sell the Exchequer bills, and appropriate the proceeds to their own use, and afterwards fail; for he ought either to have kept the bills in his own hands, or distinctly to have separated them from the other property in the possession of the brokers. Mathew v. Brice, 15 Law J. 39—L. C.

UNCERTAINTY—See "Legacies."

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Reserved Bid.—Where the particulars of sale do not state either that the sale is to be without reserve, or that the vendors intend to employ a person to bid on their behalf, and they privately instruct a person to bid up to a certain amount, and he does so accordingly, but one of the bidders bids considerably more than that amount, and becomes the purchaser, and it does not appear that, in so doing, he was misled by any confidence he placed in the other person's judgment, he will be obliged to complete the purchase. Woodward v. Miller, 15 Law J. 6—V. C. B. In this case, the defendant, in his answer, alleged that the auctioneer had stated in the auction-room that the premises were to be sold without reserve. But the person employed to bid for the vendors stated, in his evidence, that the auctioneer only said that the sale was to be a bona fide one, and that, if there were any puffers in the room, he should hate himself. And hence the allegation of the defendant was not held to form any additional ground of defence.

Necessity of producing and proving the Ownership of a surrendered Lease, on a Sale of Leaseholds for Lives.

—Where leaseholds for lives are contracted to be sold, and the lease under which they are held states that it was granted in consideration of the surrender of a former lease, the vendor, in the absence of any express stipulation upon the point, is bound not only to produce such former lease, but also to shew, that, at the time of the surrender, it belonged absolutely, as well in equity as at law, to the person who surrendered it and took the new lease, although it be necessary for that purpose to carry back the title more than sixty years; for the new Statute of Limitations does not shorten the period for which titles are to be deduced. Hodgkinson v. Cooper, 10 Jur. 39—M. R. In this case, the subsisting lease was granted in 1815, and the former lease in 1769.

Action for Use and Occupation, where a good Title cannot be made.—Where a person contracts for the purchase of land, and agrees to pay interest in case of his default in payment of the purchase-money on a certain day, and is let into possession and treated as purchaser by the vendor, but is prevented from completing the purchase from the want of a good title, he is not liable at law to the payment of any rent in respect of the use and occupation of the land; because, after treating him as purchaser, the vendor cannot convert him into an occupier, liable to pay for his occupation, by his (the vendor's) own wrongful default in not making a good title. Winterbottom v. Ingham, 10 Jur. 4—Q. B.

Sale of a reversionary Interest at an Under-value.—A sale of a reversionary interest in real and personal property, by a young man in straitened circumstances, to a trustee of part of the property, at a material under-value, will be set aside, although the purchase was made at the instance of the vendor, and against the inclination of the purchaser. And if 1900*l.* is the actual value, 1700*l.* is to be considered a material under-value. Edwards v. Browne, 2 Coll. 100.

Agreement to accept a Title "without Dispute."—Where a person agrees to purchase an estate, and to accept the vendor's title "without dispute," but it is also agreed that an abstract of title shall be furnished, and the purchaser discovers from the abstract that there is an outstanding legal estate, he is precluded from taking the objection, notwithstanding the delivery of the abstract by the vendor, and his entering into a correspondence on the subject of the objection. Duke v. Barnett, 10 Jur. 87—V. C. B.

VESTED INTEREST.

Direction to pay and divide six months after the death of a prior taker.—Where a testator bequeaths the residue of his personal estate upon trust for his wife, for her life, if she shall so long continue his widow; and, after her decease or marriage, upon trust to pay and divide the whole unto and equally amongst all and every his nephews and nieces, share and share alike, within six months after they shall have become entitled thereto; the property vests in them on the testator's decease; the possession alone being postponed for the sake of the prior taker and the convenience of the estate; so that if one of them dies in the lifetime of the widow, his or her share passes to his or her personal representatives. Packham v. Gregory, 4 Hare, 396.

Limitation to the Testator's right Heirs of his own Name.—Where a testator, after devising particular estates, makes an ultimate devise to his own right heirs of his own name, and his, her, and their heirs; and there is nothing in the will which clearly shews that the word "heir" is used in any other than its technical sense, or that the ultimate devise was intended to create a contingent remainder in favour of the person who should answer the given description on the expiration of the particular estates; in such case the ultimate devise creates a vested interest in favour of the person who, at the time of the testator's decease, is his heir-at-law, and bears his name; because it is a rule of law that an interest shall be construed to vest as early as possible; and because the word "heir," unexplained, means the person on whom the law casts the inheritance on the ancestor's decease. Wrightson v. Macaulay, 14 Mees. & W. 214.

See "Legacy."

WILL.

Effect of an Attestation Clause—Evidence of signing and publishing.—Where an attestation is not expressly required, the mere circumstance that there is a memorandum or an attestation clause stating that certain things have been done, does not exclude evidence that other things were done besides those which are expressed to have been done. So that if a will of a married woman, made by virtue of a power, is required to be "signed and published" in the presence of witnesses, and, after the signatures of the witnesses to such will, there is a memorandum or attestation clause, only stating that the will was "signed and sealed" in their presence, evidence may be adduced to shew that it was also published in their presence. And the evidence of two witnesses, that it was declared by the testatrix to be her "will," although according to the evidence of the third it was declared by her to be her "act," is sufficient evidence that it was published. And so the evidence of two witnesses that it was signed in their presence is sufficient evidence of that fact, although the third witness believes it to have been signed before they entered the room. Warren v. Postlethwaite, 2 Coll. 108.

Pencil Erasure.—A pencil erasure of an annuity given by will may be either deliberative or final, according to circumstances; but prima facie it is only deliberative, indicating that the testator contemplated making an alteration in his will, and not final and amounting to a positive revocation. Francis v. Grover, 15 Law J. 99—V. C. W.

Inference that a Testator meant to devise Property in which he had only a Life Interest—Election.—Where a testator is entitled in fee to some messuages and lands in a parish, and entitled for life to other messuages and lands in the same parish, and he devises all his messuages and lands in that parish, subject to a charge of legacies on a part of the particular hereditaments in which he had only a life estate; it is not to be inferred, from his dealing with that part as his own, that he meant to include in the devise the other part of the same hereditaments, so as to raise a case of election against a person claiming such other part of those hereditaments as a remainder-man, and also claiming under the will as to property of which the testator was seised in fee. Parker v. Carter, 4 Hare, 400.

LONDON, JUNE 6, 1846.

At a time when so much English capital is engaged in Railroad Companies in France, and when it is likely that such investments will become more and more extended, we shall, we think, be doing service to our readers, by bringing under their attention the general state of the French law of partnership.

By the French code (Code de Commerce, liv. 1, tit. 3, s. 1) three regular species of partnership are recognised.

The first, termed "société en nom collectif," is that which is formed between two or more persons, having for its object to trade under a style or firm. These partnerships are constituted by deed, which may be either a public deed, that is, a deed passed by public officers, having certain powers, (see Code Civil, liv. 3, tit. 3, s. 1); or by private deed, which, to have full effect, must be executed pursuant to certain regulations contained in the Code Civil, (sect. 1325). The partnership termed "société en nom collectif" does not seem to differ from an ordinary English partnership. The persons whose names are contained in the partnership deed are all liable, to the extent of their respective estates, for all the contracts of the firm, even though such contract should be only signed by one of the partners, provided he has signed in the name of the firm.

The second kind of partnership regularly recognised by the French law, is that which is termed "société en commandite;" and this is the species of partnership which, we believe, is most frequently adopted in France for public undertakings.

The peculiarity of the "société en commandite" is this: it is a partnership composed of certain shareholders, who are individually liable for all the engagements of the partnership; and of certain others, who are in the nature of mere lenders of money to the partnership, and are only liable to the extent of the money they have lent or contracted to lend, that is, to the extent of their shares. The shareholders generally responsible, are termed solidaires or commandités; and the shareholders responsible only to the extent of their shares, are termed commanditaires. Such partnerships are carried on under a style, which must be composed of the names of some one or more of the shareholders generally responsible; and it would be wrong to introduce into the ostensible names of the firm, the name of a shareholder commanditaire; to do so, with his acquiescence, would, in fact, make him a shareholder commandité, and liable for all the debts of the partnership. The management of the concerns of a partnership en commandite, is vested in the shareholders commandités exclusively; and this seems to be, in fact, the distinguishing attribute, in virtue of which the general liability arises; for, if a shareholder commanditaire, that is, not overtly and expressly put forward as a commandité or solidaire, does any direct or indirect act of management, he becomes liable immediately as a solidaire or commandité, that is, individually liable for all the debts and engagements of the partnership. The terms of the 27th and 28th sections of the Code de Commerce (liv. 1, tit. 3) on this point are as follows:—Sect. 27. A partner commanditaire may not do any act of management, nor be employed in or about the business of the partnership, even under a power of attorney. Sect. 28. In case of breach of the prohibition mentioned in the preceding article, the partner commanditaire is bound solidairement, that is, generally, with the partners generally responsible, for all the debts and engagements of the partnership.

It behoves, therefore, Englishmen taking shares as commanditaires, viz. mere shareholders, in a French company par commandite, to consider well what acts they do, savouring in the remotest degree of management, lest they render themselves partners liable to the whole extent of their assets, for the engagements of the company. They must recollect, that, if the question arises in such a form that their liability would depend upon what is the French law, very slight acts of interference would seem to fall within the meaning of the 28th section of the Code de Commerce above cited.

The third species of regular partnership recognised by the French law is what is termed the "société anonyme." This species of partnership consists of partners, none of whom are liable beyond the extent of their shares. It cannot be formed without the special license of the Crown. It is managed by directors, who may or may not be shareholders, and are not personally liable in respect of their acts of management to third parties. It is not designated by the names of any shareholders, but by the name of the undertaking, as, for instance, "The Rouen Railroad Company," and not "Messrs. A., B., & C." Such a company seems to be nearly akin to our parliamentary or chartered joint-stock companies; its powers, liabilities, and modes of proceeding being regulated by a specific deed, which is in the nature of a royal charter.

There seems no great difficulty or danger attending the connexion with a société anonyme. As its powers are entirely regulated by a specific deed, which cannot have any legal existence, except pursuant to the royal license, it follows that acts inconsistent with the deed are mere nullities quâ acts of partnership; and, therefore, a shareholder in a société anonyme is tolerably safe, not being liable to be prejudiced by his own indiscretion; because, as the law is, and third persons are taken to know that the law is, that he can do no valid act except pursuant to the terms of the partnership deed, he may, speaking generally, commit any act of indiscretion, and, provided it be not sanctioned by the act or deed of partnership, it is, with regard to his partnership liability, as if he had done nothing. But, with regard to the société en commandite, it is quite otherwise. There the immunity of the partner commanditaire from general liability, depends entirely upon his doing no act of management. What is an act of management, the Code, in its beautiful and much-admired simplicity, wholly omits to describe; and, consequently, the only mode of securing absolute safety by the shareholder commanditaire, consists in abstaining from doing any act whatever, in which there is but the semblance of interference in the management.

It may be observed, with regard to an English shareholder commanditaire, in a French société en commandite, that, if he were to do in this country any act alleged to be an act of management, it seems doubtful, if the question of his liability had to be tried in any of our courts, to what extent it would, in fact, be tried according to the French law, or, at least, according to French principles of decision. It seems clear that any purely legal question would be decided according to the French law, the rules of which would be proved in the ordinary way, by the evidence of persons learned in the law of France. But the question, management or no management, would be a question of fact, and that, we apprehend, would be matter for the determination of the jury, if the case were such as to bring it into a court of law, or of the judge, if it came into equity. In effect, therefore, the decision would be half English and half French: French, so far as the rule of law is concerned; English, so far as the facts, and the rules of evidence applied to the proof of the facts are concerned.

The result of this inquiry is, that, as already observed, English shareholders commanditaires, in French companies en commandite, should be very cautious in their proceedings, and not forget, that, by very slight acts, they may convert themselves, from persons liable only to the extent of their shares, into partners in the strongest English sense of the word.

The Editors of THE JURIST regret to find that a paper printed ante, p. 183, referring to a pamphlet by Mr. Swinburne, has been thought by that gentleman to misrepresent or misapprehend his views and arguments. We are unable ourselves to perceive the misrepresentation or misapprehension, and must, therefore, beg such of our readers as take an interest in the subject, to compare the pamphlet and the paper in question, and judge for themselves.

ON ASSETS BY DESCENT.

The following observations are intended as in some degree supplementary to two papers which some time since appeared in THE JURIST "On Descent among Coparceners," and "On the Curtesy of the Husband of a Coparcener." In reply to the extended correspondence to which these papers have given rise, the writer begs leave simply to request the readers of THE JURIST to peruse the papers. The two positions which the writer believes to be the best established are those which have been the most attacked, namely, that, under the old law, when descent was traced from a parent, the issue of a daughter were entitled by representation to the entire share which such daughter would still have held had she not died, to the exclusion of a surviving sister*; and that, under the new law, the purchaser only can be the stock of descent, or that all lands must descend to his heirs as such. In support of the former of these positions the writer has no further authority to offer, and he has not been furnished with any opposing authority which he might discuss. In support of the latter, he might, perhaps, have obviated opposition by referring to the 3rd section of the Act for the Amendment of the Laws with respect to Wills, (stat. 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), which was passed when the Act to amend the Law of Inheritance had been in operation for above three years, and which seems to contain a parliamentary exposition of the latter statute. The Wills Act enacts, (sect. 3), "that it shall be lawful for every person to devise, bequeath, or dispose of, by his will, executed in manner hereinafter required, all real estate and all personal estate which he shall be entitled to, either at law or in equity, at the time of his death, and which, if not so devised, bequeathed, or disposed of, would devolve upon the heir-at-law or customary heir of him, or, if he became entitled by descent, of his ancestor, or upon his executor or administrator." The insertion of the words in italics would have been erroneous, if lands descended do not always devolve on the heir of the ancestor as such. According to the opposing theory, the words should have been, "if he became entitled by descent, and did not gain an actual seisin, or do anything equivalent thereto." For, according to the old law, in such event, and in such event only, did lands descend to the heir of the ancestor as such; and the theory in question asserts, that, in this respect, the old law has not been changed. The act we have cited, however, draws a distinction between the heirs of the testator and the heirs of his ancestor, and implies that lands will devolve on the heir of the owner only when he has not become entitled by descent; and when he has become entitled by descent, they will always devolve on the heir of his ancestor, (the purchaser). The heir of a person must always mean his heir as such, and not as heir to anybody else, unless the context shews a contrary intention.

* [We understand, that, in a case which occurred under the old law, of a descent of a reversion to two daughters, one of whom died without having acquired seisin, leaving issue, the late Mr. Duval and another learned conveyancer now living gave opinions to the effect that the surviving daughter was entitled by descent to three-fourths of the entire estate.—Ed.]

It seems clear, therefore, that, when Parliament enacted, that, in every case, descent shall be traced from the purchaser, and explained descent to mean "the title to inherit land by reason of consanguinity," that it intended to enact, that, in every case, the purchaser only should be the stock of descent, to whose heirs, as such, all hereditaments should descend; and that it did not intend to enact, that, in every case, the title should be traced from the same person as before the act, but that such persons should be his heirs as would have been entitled if the title to inherit had been traced from the purchaser.

The latter view of the case seems, however, to have been suggested through fear of some inconveniences with respect to "assets by descent," which might arise from the adoption of the more obvious construction. It may, therefore, perhaps, be desirable, first, to give a short statement of the doctrine of the common law on this subject, and, secondly, to consider what alterations have been made by the Act to amend the Law of Inheritance.

At the common law, then, whenever any person bound his heirs by any deed, specially executed for the purpose, to pay a debt or perform a contract, the heir of such person was liable to pay the debt or to perform the contract to the extent of the value of the hereditaments which descended from such person to the heir, but no further. If the heir was not bound by deed, or if no hereditaments descended to him from the person who executed the deed, he was under no liability, because he had no assets by descent; that is, he had not enough (assets) descended to him to render him liable. This being the state of the law, it was soon decided, that, if a person bound his heirs by deed to pay a debt, and lands of sufficient value descended from him to his heir, it was not competent to the heir to avoid his liability, by neglecting or refusing to enter upon the lands. (Year-book, 42 Edw. 3. 10 b). In such a case the heir might have obtained an actual seisin at his will, and it was, consequently, just that his liability should not be defeated by his own obstinacy or neglect; but until entry it is evident that the heir had only a seisin in law. Hereditaments, therefore, of which the heir had only a seisin in law, were assets by descent to answer to debts of the ancestor from whom they descended, if such debts were secured by specialty binding his heirs.

But, supposing the heir should himself have died before he had taken possession of the lands, and should in his lifetime have executed specialties binding his heirs to the payment of debts, the question then arose whether the next heir was liable or not to pay such debts in respect of the lands descended to him. And it was determined that such next heir was under no liability to pay such debts; for the maxim was, "Seisina facit stipitem;" and, as the meane or intermediate heir had not been actually seised, the descent was traced to the next heir, not from the meane heir as the stock of descent, but from the ancestor who was last seised. In this case, therefore, the last heir was not bound to pay the debts of his immediate predecessor, because the lands which descended did not descend from him, but from the ancestor last seised. So that, if there had been a grandfather, father, and son, and the grandfather had died seised of lands in fee simple, and the father had bound himself and his heirs in a bond, and had then died before entering on the lands, the son would not have been bound, in respect of these lands, to pay his father's bond debt, because he "made himself heir to," or traced his descent from, his grandfather, who was last seised. (Hale, MSS.; Co. Litt. 11. b., n. (3)).

If the lands had been in the occupation of a tenant for years, the case would have been different; for the possession of every tenant for years is, in the eye of the law, the actual possession of the freeholder, even though the latter should get no rent. In such a case, therefore, the father, or meane heir, would have been considered as actually seised, and the lands would, on his death, have descended to the son as his (the father's) heir, and not as heir to the grandfather. Such lands, therefore, would have constituted assets by descent, in respect of which the son would have been bound to pay his father's debts secured by bond in which his heirs were bound. (Bushby v. Dixon, 3 B. & C. 298).

If the lands had been let to a tenant for the term of his life, another state of circumstances would have arisen. The tenant having an estate of freehold would have been seised of the lands, and nothing would have been left to descend but a reversion expectant on this estate. This reversion, however, was itself an estate of inheritance in lands, vested in the owner, grantable by deed with the tenant's attornment, and possessing a value as actual property. It was accordingly considered as assets by descent; that is, if the lessor had bound his heirs in an obligation or bond, the heir of the lessor was liable on the bond to the value of the reversion which descended from his ancestor to him. (See Tyndal v. Warre, Jac. 212). In this case no question could arise as to the heir's liability in case of his neglecting to obtain actual seisin; for the seisin of the land belonged to the tenant for life, and whilst he was thus seised no one else could be. The heir of the reversioner who had granted the lease was at once liable to the debt in respect of the reversion which descended from his ancestor.

Suppose, however, that the heir, whilst the reversion was thus vested in him, had himself entered into a bond, in which he had bound his heirs to the payment of money. The reversion vested in him was evidently, to all intents and purposes, his own property. It would have been bound by his judgment debts; (Giffard v. Barber, 2 Cru. Dig., tit. "Reversion," s. 38; S. C., 4 Vin. Abr. 461; 1 Ves. sen. 174); but what was the law with respect to his bond? The law was this: that the reversion was not assets to render the next heir liable on such bond. (Watk. Descents, 118, 4th ed.; Giffard v. Barber, ubi supra). And why? Simply because the descent of the reversion was traced, on the heir's decease, not from him, but from the original lessor. The maxim "Seisina facit stipitem" could not apply; for the tenant for life alone was seised, and the original ancestor, consequently, still continued to be the stock of descent. The next heir, therefore, though he had the reversion as assets by descent, had it not by descent from the meane heir, but from the original ancestor. To such ancestor's debts he certainly was liable, but not to the debts of any intermediate heir in whom the reversion might have vested in its course of descent from the original ancestor.

Let us now endeavour to apply these principles to the altered state of things produced by the Act for the Amendment of the Law of Inheritance, (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106). This act enacts, that, in every case, descent shall be traced from the purchaser, (sect. 2); and it explains descent to mean "the title to inherit land by reason of consanguinity" (Sect. 1). The title of every heir to inherit is, therefore, to be traced from the purchaser. This we have considered to be equivalent to saying, in the language of the old books, that the person to inherit must "make himself heir" to the purchaser, or that the purchaser is to be "the stock of descent." To this, however, it is objected, that, according to this interpretation, lands which have been inherited will not be assets by descent. The gist of the objection seems to be this: that lands of which the heir was seized, which he enjoyed during his lifetime, and might have disposed of by deed or will, will yet, on his decease, descend to the next heir of the purchaser discharged from any liability at law in respect of the bond debts of the intermediate heir. No doubt, this must be admitted as a result of our construction of the enactment. But it will be seen that such a consequence is not an inconvenience altogether unknown to the law as it stood before the passing of the act. A reversion expectant on an estate of freehold was then in the same predicament as an estate in possession is now. The reversion was real property belonging to the heir, and vested in him; and yet it was not assets to pay his bond debts, because the descent of it was not traced from him, but from his ancestor. Surely, then, it is better to adopt the plain and obvious meaning of the act, than to wrest its language for the purpose of avoiding an inconvenience, which in some cases existed before.

Practically, however, the inconvenience in question does not seem to have any existence; for, at the same time that the act passed for the amendment of the law of inheritance, was passed the "Act to render Freehold and Copyhold Estates Assets for the Payment of simple Contract Debts," 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104. This act enacts, that, "where any person shall die seized of or entitled to any estate or interest in lands, tenements, or hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, or other real estate, whether freehold, customaryhold, or copyhold, which he shall not, by his last will, have charged with or devised subject to the payment of his debts, the same shall be assets, to be administered in courts of equity, for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty." This act, it will be remarked, merely requires a dying seized of or entitled to the lands, in order to render them assets for the payment of the debts of the owner. This act, therefore, appears to have obviated all the inconvenience in this respect which the act to amend the law of inheritance would otherwise have caused. Whether the property in question be an estate in possession or reversion, the mere circumstance of the heir having died seized of or entitled to it will render it assets to be administered in equity for the payment of his debts. If, therefore, creditors, having bonds binding the heirs of their deceased debtor, are deprived by the Act to amend the Law of Inheritance of their legal remedy, in respect of lands which descended to such debtor, the act of even date gives them instead a remedy in equity. And this remedy is equal to their former remedy at law; for the act provides, that, in the administration of assets by courts of equity, under the act, all creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound shall be paid the full amount of the debts due to them, before any of the creditors by simple contract or by specialty in which the heirs are not bound shall be paid any part of their demands.

Between this proviso and the clause we first cited is a clause rendering the heir and devisee of the debtor liable to the same suits in equity, at the suit of any of the creditors of the debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as the heir or devisee of any person who died seized of freehold estates was, before the passing of the act, liable to in respect of such freehold estates, at the suit of creditors by specialty in which the heirs were bound. This clause certainly appears to be strictly applicable only to cases in which the debtor was the purchaser of the lands, for it mentions only the heir of the debtor. But it seems impossible, on this account, to consider the clause as in any way restrictive of the sweeping remedial enactment by which it is preceded. Creditors having specialties binding the heirs of their debtor were certainly intended to be benefited by the act, for it gives them a claim in respect of copyhold lands which they did not possess before. A remedial act is to be construed liberally; and a further clause, applicable only to certain cases, ought not to be considered as narrowing the comprehensive remedy plainly furnished by the preceding enactment.

From the whole there is one conclusion to be drawn, in which all will most probably agree, and that is, that the Act for the Amendment of the Law of Inheritance is one of those amendments of the law which greatly needs to be itself amended. J. W.

LONDON, JUNE 13, 1846.

A QUESTION of some practical importance, upon which, we believe, no decision is to be found, and which not unfrequently arises in reference to inventions of the smaller class, is this: whether, if A. has invented some manufacture, and has used it for his own use merely, without making it public, but without any specific concealment, and B. afterwards invents the same thing and takes out a patent for it, A. will be liable to be restrained from using it for his own use and convenience merely, not vending or otherwise making a profit by it.

The question must, in the absence of direct decision, depend upon the language and spirit of the Statute of Monopolies and of the letters-patent.

No doubt, to any person not accustomed to legal reasoning, or to consider the principles of laws, it seems a hardship bordering upon gross absurdity, that, if I have first invented something, any law should give to another, the privilege, not only of exclusive enjoyment as against the rest of the world, but of excluding me from the enjoyment of the production of my own brain. But, if we recollect that there is no such thing as an abstract right of property; that all rights of enjoying property are the creatures of the civil law; and that, in a thousand instances, society exercises, without any notion being entertained of its being a hardship, the right of curtailing and modifying in the individual, the enjoyment of property, where prima facie his right as absolutely appertains to him, as the right of a man to enjoy the production of his own brain;—we shall see that no peculiar hardship and no injustice can be complained of, if it should turn out to be the rule established by the civil law, that an inventor loses even his right of personal enjoyment, by neglecting to avail himself of the conditions on which the law offers him protection, and allowing another to step in before him and obtain that protection.

The notion of hardship should be, therefore, wholly thrown out of consideration, and the question considered solely upon the language of the statute and of the letters-patent, so far as the letters-patent are not inconsistent with the statute. The language of a patent is, that authority is granted to the patentee, and such as he shall agree with, and no others, to make, use, exercise, and vend the invention; and all others are commanded not to make, use, or put in practice the invention. There is a special proviso that the grant is not to prejudice any previous patent, but none that it is not to prejudice any previous inventor who has neither taken out a patent, nor published the invention.

There can, of course, be no doubt that the private use of an invention comes within the literal language of the patent—restricting use, as well as making and vending. But it is first a question, whether, by the word "using," the patent does not mean only using in trade; and, secondly, assuming it to mean any using, then what is meant by "no other person." Upon this the language of the Statute of Monopolies will throw light. The statute provides that its abolition of all monopolies shall not extend to letters-patent and grants of privileges for the term of fourteen years or under, hereafter to be made, &c. to the true and first inventor and inventors of such manufactures which others at the time of making such letters-patent and grants shall not use. Now, the general rule of law resulting from a variety of cases is, that the user contemplated by the statute, which will avoid a patent, is user amounting to publication; that is, user which goes the length of putting it in the power of the public to obtain knowledge, if not actually to give it knowledge, of the invention.

In Morgan v. Seaward, (2 Mee. & W. 545), indeed, it was held, that, where (the subject of the patent being steam-bost, paddle-wheels) two pairs of the wheels were made for the inventor before he obtained his patent, by his own people, and were packed up and shipped to a foreign port, and there used by a company in which the inventor was a partner, even that was not user so as to invalidate the patent. It is true, the wheels were made under an injunction of secrecy in the inventor's people; but that would have made no difference, if there had been a bona fide dealing with the wheels as a matter of trading gain; and the court put the decision expressly upon this, that there was no public sale, and no gain or profit proved to be derived by the inventor. If, then, the above be the true construction of the word "use" in the statute, for the purpose of testing its effect in avoiding a patent, it is a correct inference to say that such must be its construction when the question is, not whether a patent is avoided, but whether a patent is infringed; for, if the user in the sort of case we are discussing, is such as would not avoid the subsequently-granted patent, the reason is, that such user is not inconsistent with the patent, and, therefore, it is no infringement.

The question will, therefore, be one of mixed fact and law. It will first be to be ascertained, whether the use of the invention by the first inventor has been a use so far public, that the public might by means of it, have obtained knowledge of the invention. If it has, then the subsequently-obtained patent will be void; but if it has not,—if it has been private, and without gain by way of trade,—then it seems difficult to contend that the patentee will have any right to prevent the continuance of such a mode of user; because, the statute confining the privilege to such inventions as others shall not have used before, the word "others" in the patent must be held only to apply to those whose user has been such as to avoid the patent. The patentee, therefore, could not bring the antecedent inventor within the class that he has a right to restrain, without putting himself out of court, and shewing on the face of his own statement that he has no title.

POINTS ON THE LAW AND PRACTICE OF INJUNCTIONS.

I. Injunctions to restrain the Use of Trade Marks.

The principle upon which injunctions are granted to restrain the imitation of trade marks, long exclusively used by a particular trader, so as to connect his name or trading concern, with the reputation acquired in the market by the goods bearing the particular mark, is thus expressed by Lord Langdale, M. R., in Perry v. Truett^{*}, "I think that the principle on which both the courts of law and equity proceed in granting relief and protection in cases of this sort is very well understood. A man is not to sell his own goods under the pretence that they are the goods of another man; he cannot be permitted to practise such a deception, nor to use the means which contribute to that end. He cannot, therefore, be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person. I own it does not seem to me that a man can acquire a property merely in a name or mark; but, whether he has or not a property in the name or the mark, I have no doubt that another has not a right to use that name or mark for the purpose of deception, and in order to attract to himself that course of trade or that custom which, without that improper act, would have flowed to the person who first used, or was alone in the habit of using, the particular name or mark." And in a subsequent case[†] the same learned judge again expressed himself to the same effect: "No man has a right," said his Lordship, "to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form, and say, that no man has a right to dress himself in colour, or adopt and bear symbols to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person, for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose either that he is that other person, or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person, while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest that to do these things is to commit a fraud, and a very gross fraud. I stated, upon a former occasion, that, in my opinion, the right which any person may have to the protection of this court, does not depend upon any exclusive right which he may be supposed to have to a particular name or to a particular form of words. His right is to be protected against fraud, and fraud may be practised against him by means of a name, though the person practising it may have a perfect right to use that name, provided he does not accompany the use of it with such other circumstances as to effect a fraud upon others." Accordingly, in Croft v. Day, his Lordship, being of opinion, that, although the labels used by the defendant upon the bottles of blacking sold by him were in many points different from the plaintiff's labels, yet there was sufficient to mislead the ordinary run of persons, and that the object of the defendant was to persuade the public that his establishment was in some way or other connected with the plaintiff's, granted an injunction restraining the defendant from imitating the plaintiff's labels. The order made was very specially worded, with a view to prevent the defendant from eluding the jurisdiction by colourable alteration.

In Perry v. Truett[‡], the point on which the case was principally argued was, whether, a certain unguent sold by the plaintiff, having acquired a reputation under the name of "Perry's medicated Mexican Balm," the defendant was at liberty to sell an unguent for the same purpose, under the designation of "Truett's medicated Mexican Balm." The evidence shewed that Truett (the defendant) did not attempt to induce the belief that what he was selling was the plaintiff's unguent, but he simply took the sort of fancy designation adopted by the plaintiff, of medicated Mexican balm. And the question was, whether, in the absence of fraud, the plaintiff had such a right in that designation, as to prevent the defendant's use of it. This the court held to be a legal question; and if that had been the only point, the court would, it seems, have put the matter in a course for trial of the legal right. But the plaintiff had also, in advertisements respecting his medicated Mexican balm, put forth false representations to the public, and thereby precluded himself from obtaining relief in equity in the first instance. The motion was ordered to stand over, with liberty to the plaintiff to bring an action; and some months afterwards the bill was dismissed with the consent of the plaintiff.

It will be observed, that, both in Perry v. Truett and Croft v. Day, Lord Langdale took occasion pointedly to advert to the doctrine of Millington v. Fox, and to express his opinion, that an exclusive right of property cannot be acquired in a name or mark. "The case of Millington v. Fox," said his Lordship, in Truett v. Perry, (7 Bea. 73), "seems to have gone this length, that the deception need not be intentional; and that a man, though not intending any injury to another, shall not be allowed to adopt the mark by which the goods of another are designated, if the effect of adopting them would be to prejudice the trade of such other person. I am not aware that any previous case carried the principle to that extent." The writer believes that there is not any case since Perry v. Truett and Day v. Croft carrying the principle so far as it was carried in Milington v. Fox. It will not, however, be forgotten, that that case was most fully argued, and that the judgment is one of the most careful of the many elaborate judgments delivered by the eminently cautious judge who pronounced it.

II. As to reading Affidavits against the Answer on a Motion to dissolve an Injunction.

It has generally been understood, that, on moving to dissolve the common injunction, if facts and circumstances alleged by the bill are ignored by the answer, affidavits cannot be read on the part of the plaintiff to substantiate the allegations of the bill. This doctrine has received some discountenance from the case of *Ord v. White. In that case facts essential to the plaintiff's case were alleged in the bill, and by the answer neither admitted nor denied, but simply ignored. The Master of the Rolls thought (though it was not necessary to decide the point, as he granted the injunction irrespectively of the affidavits tendered by the plaintiff) that in such a case affidavits may be read by the plaintiff to prove the allegations of the bill. The case of Castellan v. Blumshel† was not cited in Ord v. White.

In Barwell v. Barwell‡ the defendant by her answer stated, as to certain facts, that she had been informed and believed it to be true, &c.; and Ord v. White was cited as an authority for reading affidavits on behalf of the plaintiff to contradict those statements in the answer. But Lord Langdale, M. R., refused to hear them, observing that no one ever doubted that affidavits are inadmissible, when the defendant distinctly states his belief. His Lordship referred to his dictum in Ord v. White, observing that he had not decided the point, and neither recalling nor reasserting the opinion that he had there expressed.

The case of Edwards v. Jones§ seems to have settled the point, although not upon an injunction motion. In that case, on a motion for a receiver, among other things, an affidavit was tendered by the plaintiff to prove the death of a particular person, (the period of whose death was very material), the answer ignoring the fact of the alleged death. It was contended, on the authority of Ord v. White and other cases, that the affidavit was admissible; but the Vice-Chancellor of England held the affidavit inadmissible, and, on appeal, Lord Lyndhurst, C., affirmed the decision. "An affidavit," said his Lordship, "was offered to prove the fact that Howell Powell (the person whose death it was material to ascertain) was alive at the time of the death of the intestate. Now, where the question at issue is not the existence of a document, but a fact, I think that an affidavit cannot be admitted to prove it in an interlocutory application like the present, though the answer neither admits nor denies it. There is an apparent discrepancy between the authorities on the subject, but I think that is the fair result of them."

It has been also generally understood, with reference to special injunctions, that, if a motion is made for an injunction upon the answer of the defendant, the plaintiff cannot read affidavits against the answer upon matter of title. But where a notice of motion was given before answer, and affidavits filed in support of it, and the motion stood over at the request of the defendant that he might put in his answer; and after he had done so, the plaintiff filed further affidavits in respect of title, contradicting the answer: it was held, that, under those circumstances, the answer must be treated as an affidavit, and, consequently, the further affidavits were admissible*. But, if a motion for a special injunction is made after the answer has come in, (the motion not having stood over for the defendant's convenience, and that he may put his answer in), and no affidavits were filed before the answer, affidavits filed after the answer cannot be read in support of the motion, even as to matters not connected with title; and that, irrespectively of the question whether the notice was given before the answers were put in, or afterwards†. The judgment in this case, and the learned Reporter's notes, contain nearly all the learning upon this point. C. S. D.

THE LAW

RELATING TO THE

DISPOSITION OF REVERSIONARY INTERESTS OF MARRIED WOMEN IN CHATELS PERSONAL.

By JOSIAH W. SMITH, B.C.L.,

OF LINCOLN'S INN, BARRISTER AT LAW,
Editor of Fearne's Contingent Remainders, and Author of a Treatise on Easementary Interests.

However engrossed with other labors the lawyer may be, this subject is one of such great practical importance, that any attempt to clear away its difficulties can hardly fail to engage his attention. Such an attempt is made in the present paper; not in the spirit of disputation, although the subject presents such ample scope for it, but, on the contrary, with the determination to avoid all personal controversy, and simply to reconcile the cases, as far as possible; to enunciate what, from a close consideration of the law, the writer believes to be the truth; and to defend the doctrine of the cases, so far as they are reconcilable, from the objections which are commonly urged against them.

PART I.

The Specific Points established by the Cases.

The following points appear to be established by the decisions with reference to the disposition of quasi remainders and other future interests, or, as they are commonly termed, reversionary interests, in stock, money, and other chattels personal, limited to women married at the time, or women who afterwards marry, to take effect on the determination of a life interest in another person:—

I. A vested reversionary interest of a married woman in personalty, if bequeathed or settled to her separate use, may be assigned by her as effectually as a reversionary interest may be assigned by a feme sole; because, as to property so bequeathed or settled, whether in possession or otherwise, she is regarded as a feme sole.

So that, where an annuity is devised to a married woman for life for her separate use, charged on land after the decease of a tenant for life of the land, and she and her husband assign it by way of mortgage, she will be bound by such assignment after her husband's death. Major v. Lansley, 2 Russ. & My. 355.

And where a married woman has a reversionary interest in personalty for her separate use, she may effectually dispose of it to a purchaser, without the necessity of any examination in court. Sturgis v. Corp, 13 Ves. 190.

II. But where a contingent reversionary interest in personalty is given to a married woman in lieu of dower by her husband, to take effect as a provision for her in case of her surviving him, a court of equity will not order the property to be paid over to the husband and wife on their joint application, even though the reversionary interest is given for her separate use, and though they are both of advanced age, and in want of the common necessities of life. Batt v. Cuthbertson, 2 Irish Rep. 200; 4 Dru. & W. 392.

III. A reversionary interest of a married woman in personalty not bequeathed or settled for her separate use, cannot, while it continues reversionary, be disposed of by her and her husband, or either of them, or by act of law, whether voluntarily or for valuable consideration, and whether to a purchaser or to a general assignee in bankruptcy or insolvency, or be merely charged, so effectually as to bind the wife, if the husband dies in her lifetime without having reduced it into possession, and she then chooses to assert her right to it, even if it ceases to be reversionary before his death; although it may be effectually disposed of or charged, except in respect of this contingency. For, as Sir Thomas Plumer remarked in Purdew v. Jackson, "The wife's right is not divested by the marriage. The chose in action continues to belong to her, unless the husband can and does reduce it into possession, and thereby makes it cease to be a chose in action. The husband has not, on the marriage, any immediate property in the chose in action; he has only the right to reduce it into possession, if it be in a state capable of being so reduced. Reduction into possession is a necessary and indispensable preliminary to the husband's having any right of property in himself, or to his being able to convey any right of property to another." (1 Russ. 68). "For the property in a personal chattel does not become complete till possession is obtained." (Id. 14). "And to say that the assignment of a chose in action, which is at the time incapable of being reduced into possession, is to be construed as a reduction of it into possession, is to ascribe to the assignment the effect of totally transforming the nature of the thing assigned." (Id. 45). Hence,

1. Where stock is limited by will in trust for a person for life, with remainder (not by way of separate use) in trust for a married woman, or a woman who afterwards marries, and she and her husband join in assigning it to a purchaser for valuable consideration, and both the wife and the tenant for life outlive the husband, such assignment will not be valid against the right of the wife. (Purdew v. Jackson, 1 Russ. 1; Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65; Watson v. Dennis, 3 Russ. 90). For, in this case, as the husband dies before the tenant for life, and, therefore, before the property is even capable of being reduced into possession, it continues in the wife, or, as the phrase is, it survives to the wife, unaffected by the coverture and the assignment made during the coverture.

According to the decision, indeed, in the case of Atkins v. Dawbury, (Gilb. Eq. Rep. 88), where a legacy is given to a married woman, payable out of a reversion in land expectant on an estate for life, and the husband assigns the legacy in trust for his children, and predeceases his wife and the tenant for life, the assignment is good against the wife in equity, although not at law; and though this legacy is charged on a reversion, yet, being given in present, it carries interest from the testator's death. But, as Sir Thomas Plumer, M. R., remarked in Purdew v. Jackson, (1 Russ. 48), "Atkins v. Dawbury is abandoned, and is admitted not to be law."

2. Where a married woman is entitled to stock in remainder after a life interest in another person, and her husband assigns her interest, becomes bankrupt, and dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, leaving his wife surviving, she is entitled against the particular assignee and the assignees under the commission. Grey v. Kentish, 1 Atk. 280.

3. And where personal property is bequeathed in trust for a person for life, with remainder, as to a part, in trust for another person for life; with remainder to a woman who afterwards marries; and, after her marriage and the death of the first taker, such property is settled upon her children, in pursuance of articles entered into before her marriage, when she was under age; and then, before the property is transferred from the names of the executors of the will into the names of the trustees of the settlement, he dies, leaving his wife surviving; the trusts of the settlement do not bind that part to which the wife, at the time of the settlement, was entitled in remainder on the death of the second taker; nor are they binding even on that part to which, at the time of the settlement, the wife was entitled in possession, in consequence of the death of the first taker, notwithstanding it might and ought to have been transferred into the names of the trustees of the settlement in the husband's lifetime, and notwithstanding the maxim, that equity looks on that as done which ought to have been done. Elwyn v. Williams, 7 Jur. 337.

4. And where a legacy is given to a woman, who afterwards marries, to be paid after the decease of another person, and she and her husband assign the legacy for valuable consideration in the lifetime of that person, and the husband survives such person, but dies leaving his wife surviving, without having reduced the legacy into possession, the assignment is void against the wife. Ashby v. Ashby, 1 Coll. 553.

5. And where a sum of money is bequeathed in trust for a person for life, with remainder to a woman, who marries, and whose husband becomes bankrupt, and then, after surviving the tenant for life, dies without having reduced the legacy into possession, his assignees will not be entitled as against his surviving wife. Gayer v. Wilkinson, 2 Dick. 491.

6. And where stock is limited by deed in trust for a person for life, with remainder to a woman, who subsequently marries, and joins with her husband in assigning her reversionary interest for valuable consideration, and a general assignment is afterwards made of his property under the Insolvent Debtors Act, and, after surviving the tenant for life, he dies without having done any other act to reduce the stock into possession; the wife is entitled to it as against both the particular assignee and the general assignee; for the assignment only puts the assignee of the husband in the same situation as the husband. Hornby v. Lee, 2 Mad. 16.

Where, however, personal property is bequeathed to a married woman, by way of remainder after a life interest in another, and the husband becomes bankrupt, and then the tenant for life dies, and afterwards the wife dies, and he takes out administration to her; the property cannot be retained by the husband, but belongs to his assignees, because the husband had an incipient right to the chose in action at the time of his bankruptcy, and the event happened on which he was enabled to reduce it into possession. Ripley v. Woods, 2 Sim. 165.

7. Where personal property is bequeathed upon trust for a person for life, with remainder to a woman who marries, and afterwards separates from her husband, and, by a deed of separation, she assigns part of her reversionary interest to the husband, such assignment is not binding upon her after surviving her husband. Stamper v. Barker, 5 Mad. 157.

8. And where stock is limited by a marriage settlement upon trust for the separate use of the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife; with remainder, in case she shall survive him, upon trust for her, her executors, administrators, and assigns, but, in case she shall die in his lifetime, upon trust for such persons as she shall by will appoint, and, in default thereof, upon trust for her, her executors, administrators, and assigns; and she executes a bond during the coverture, and survives her husband; it will not bind her property. Lee v. Mugeridge, 1 Ves. & B. 118.

9. Where stock is limited by will in trust for a person for life, with remainder to a married woman; and she and her husband join in assigning parts of the stock to different purchasers for valuable consideration, and then the husband dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, leaving his wife surviving, who makes an assignment of another portion of the stock to one of the former purchasers, by a deed indorsed on the former assignment to him, and reciting that he was entitled to a certain portion of the stock under the within-written indenture, and referring to the other assignments, and purporting to transfer the property subject to those assignments; such deed does not operate as a confirmation of the prior assignments. Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65.

IV. Where a married woman has a reversionary interest in personalty vested in trustees, and not bequeathed or settled to her separate use, a court of equity will not order it to be paid over to any other person, even on the application of the wife, unless, perhaps, under very special circumstances, where it appears to be greatly for the benefit of the family in general, and where the trustees fully concur in the application. Hence,

1. Where personalty is settled on the husband for life; and, if he survives his wife, it is to go to him absolutely; but, if she survives, to her absolutely; and they file a bill, praying that the whole may be paid to the husband; the bill will be dismissed. (Seaman v. Duell, 10 Ves. 580). For, as the wife could not have assigned her interest to her husband, so neither will a court of equity order the money to be paid to him, and thereby defeat the objects of a settlement by stripping the wife of the provision made for her by the settlement.

2. And where a married woman has a reversionary interest in stock in court under a settlement, subject to a life interest of another person, and not settled to her separate use, the court will not order such stock to be transferred to the tenant for life, on the application of the husband and wife. Box v. Box, 2 Con. & L. 605.

3. But where personalty is limited by a marriage settlement in trust for the husband for life, with remainder in trust for the wife for life, with remainder in trust for such persons as the survivor shall appoint, and the husband and wife appoint the property to the husband; and, on a bill being filed against the trustees to carry this appointment into execution, and to have the settlement cancelled, they state in their answer that they are desirous that the prayer of the bill should be complied with, as being for the benefit of the family, and the wife consents in court; the court will, under very special circumstances, make the decree accordingly. (Macarmic v. Buller, 1 Cox, 357). In this case, the husband had been appointed governor of Cape Breton; and, in Sperling v. Rochfort, (8 Ves. 174), Lord Eldon, C., said he was counsel in the case of Macarmic v. Buller, and that the husband could not have taken the appointment without the use of the money.

There is also a case of Butler v. Duncomb, (2 Vern. 762), in which a married woman was entitled to a portion raisable by means of a term out of real estate, after the death of the tenant for life, and no interest was payable for it in the meantime; and the court, with the consent of the wife, decreed that the husband (who was a considerable tradesman) might dispose of a moiety of the portion. But this case must be regarded as overruled.

V. A court of equity will not establish a contract for the sale of the reversionary interest of a married woman in personalty, not bequeathed or settled for her separate use, except subject and without prejudice to her right to avoid such contract in case her husband dies before her without having reduced the fund into possession. Hence,

1. Where stock is bequeathed in trust for a person for life, with remainder to a woman, who afterwards marries, and a suit is instituted, the court will not take her consent to a transfer to a purchaser from her husband and herself. Wade v. Saunders, 1 T. & R. 306.

2. But where personalty is bequeathed to a person for life, with remainder to a feme for life, who afterwards marries, and, with her husband, contracts to sell her reversionary interest, and a bill is filed by them for a specific performance, at the desire of the purchaser, in order that the consent of the wife may be taken by the court, the court will take her consent de bene esse, and decree a specific performance. (Hewitt v. Croucher, before Lord Alvanley, and Woodlands v. Croucher, before Sir W. Grant, 12 Ves. 174). In Box v. Box, (2 Con. & L. 609), Sir E. Sugden, C., said, "I do not quite understand the meaning of taking her consent de bene esse, unless you treat it as a contingent interest, and say that the consent was to operate if the fund ever fell into possession;" i. e. if the married woman, who had only a life interest, survived the prior taker. But Mr. Roper, in his work on Husband and Wife, (2nd ed., p. 248), and Mr. Daniell, in his Treatise on Chancery Practice, (Vol. 1, ed. 1, p. 165), and Sir T. Plumer, V. C., in Hornby v. Lee, (2 Mad. 20), understand it to mean a consent taken so as not to preclude the question as to her title by survivorship, in the event of the wife being the survivor. And this view would seem most to accord with the general tenor of the judgment.

And, where money was limited by a marriage settlement upon trust for the husband and wife successively for life, with remainder to their children as they or the survivor should appoint, and, for want of appointment, among the children equally; and, in case that both the husband and wife should die without children, or that the children should die under twenty-one, then in trust for the wife, her executors, administrators, or assigns; and, if she should die without issue, then, as to part, in trust for such person as she should appoint; and, as to another part, to the husband; and as to the rest, in trust for the husband for life, and then in trust for such persons as she should appoint; and, her husband being in distress, she made an assignment and appointment; and a bill was filed to have her consent taken, and to establish the assignment and appointment, subject to the claims of the husband and wife for life, and the right of the children; the money was ordered to be paid into court for the contingent trusts of the settlement, and the conveyance, with the wife's consent, was established. Guise v. Small, 1 Anst. 277.

There is, indeed, a decision in Howard v. Damiani, (2 Jac. & Walk. 458, n.), that, where a fund vested in trustees is given to a woman who afterwards marries, to be paid to her after the death of another person who has a life interest in the fund, and such tenant for life purchases the married woman's reversionary interest from her husband, the court, on the consent of the wife, will order the trustees to pay over the fund to the tenant for life. But this decision must be regarded as overruled by many of the cases previously noticed.

VI. Where a married woman is entitled to a reversionary interest in a fund in court, subject to a life interest in another person, who is not her husband, and such person surrenders his life interest to the married woman, the court will take the consent of the married woman to a payment of the fund to her husband, and order payment to him accordingly; because the interest of the married woman has ceased to be reversionary. Lachon v. Adams, 5 Law Journ., N. S., C., 382.

In this case the Vice-Chancellor made the order on an ex parte application. Mr. G. Richards, after the rising of the Vice-Chancellor, applied to the Lord Chancellor to take the consent of the married woman for the payment. The Lord Chancellor (Lord Cottenham) said, the life estate had merged, and the interest of the married woman was no longer reversionary. He therefore took her consent, and made the order. Id.

VII. Where a sum is limited by will in trust for a married woman, by way of remainder after a life interest in another person who is not her husband, without being limited for her separate use, and the money is paid by the trustee to the husband, with his wife's consent, on his undertaking to pay the interest to the tenant for life; in such case, if the wife files a bill for the sum so paid over, it will be dismissed, because, by means of the payment of the fund itself to the husband, it becomes completely reduced into possession by him. Dowdell v. Earle, 12 Ves. 478.

In this case, it was argued for the executors of the trustee and executrix, who paid over the money, and for the executors of the husband, that the wife consented to the payment at the time, and acquiesced in it for nine years after her husband's death. But the decision, for which no grounds are stated in the judgment, could not have been justly founded on these circumstances. The mere consent of the wife during coverture was a nullity; and, as to her subsequent acquiescence, she merely postponed proceeding until the death of the tenant for life, until her own right of possession accrued; and it would not seem reasonable that she should have been under the necessity of involving herself in a Chancery suit respecting the money while her interest in it was yet future in point of enjoyment, and when she might die before any present right of immediate enjoyment accrued. (See Honnor v. Morton, 3 Russ. 65).

VIII. Where stock is limited by way of remainder for a woman who afterwards marries, and the tenant for life, who is not her husband, agrees to surrender the life interest in such manner as that the same may be merged and extinguished, so as to reduce the interest of the married woman into possession, so that the stock may be transferred to the husband, but the trustees refuse to join in the arrangement except under the indemnity of the court; in such case, on a bill being filed for the purpose, the court will order such arrangement to be carried into effect. This was done by the Vice-Chancellor of England in Creed v. Perry, (2 Eq. Rep. 42). And an arrangement of the same kind was established by the same learned judge in the case of Wilson v. Oldham, March 5, 1841, cited by Mr. Lewin in his work on Trusts, (2nd ed., 296), which was a case of an amicable suit, instituted by the advice of the late Mr. Jacob; who, as Mr. Lewin states, wrote an opinion, that, if the tenant for life, who was not the husband of the feme, assigned his interest to her, the effect would be to convert her interest into an immediate right to the fund in possession.

IX. But where personal property is limited by marriage settlement in trust for the sole and separate use of the wife for life; and, if she survives her husband, it is to be absolutely hers; and, if she dies in his lifetime, it is to go to such persons as she shall appoint; and, in default of appointment, to her executors and administrators; and she executes an appointment in his favour, and then she and her husband apply to the Court of Chancery for a transfer of the property in court to them, such an application will not be granted. (Richards v. Chambers, 10 Ves. 580). For in this case there is no conversion of the reversionary interest into an interest in possession by merger of the prior life interest. The appointment over the reversionary interest is only to take effect in an event yet in contingency, and that event is the event of his surviving her: so that the reversionary interest could not be said to be vested in the husband by force of the appointment: nor could it be vested in him by force of his marital right; for (as Sir Thomas Plumer observes in the passage already quoted) the husband "has only the right to reduce it into possession, if it be in a state capable of being so reduced."

Admitting, then, this case to have been rightly decided, as, for the foregoing reasons, the writer conceives it was, it does not clash with the decisions previously noticed.

But, according to the case of Ellis v. Atkinson, (3 Bro. C. C. 563), where personal property is limited by a settlement in trust for the separate use of the wife during the joint lives of herself and her husband; with remainder, in case she shall survive him, in trust for herself, her executors or administrators; but, in case she shall die in his lifetime, upon such trusts as she shall by deed or will appoint; and, in default of appointment, in trust for her executors or administrators; and she appoints that her husband shall receive the interest during their joint lives, and that, in case she shall die in his lifetime, the property shall, after her decease, be in trust for him, his executors, administrators, and assigns; and she ("so far as she is in law or equity capable of so doing") assigns the same to her husband, his executors, administrators, and assigns; in such case, on a bill filed for the purpose, the court will direct the trustees to assign the property to the husband.

Now, if this case was rightly decided, it serves to support the decisions in Lackton v. Adams and Creed v. Perry. The writer conceives, however, that it was wrongly decided; and he thinks so, for the same reasons for which he believes that the conflicting case of Richards v. Chambers was rightly decided, and because the assignment made by the wife, which is the only thing that distinguishes this case from Richards v. Chambers in point of circumstances, was a mere nullity, and therefore does not constitute any material distinction between this case and Richards v. Chambers. He may add, however, that, as this case of Ellis v. Atkinson is so clearly distinguishable from Lackton v. Adams, Creed v. Perry, Wilson v. Oldham, and Dowdell v. Earle, the opinion he entertains that it was wrongly decided, and that there were no grounds for directing the trustees to assign the property to the husband, does not in the slightest degree militate against his opinion of the soundness of the decisions in those other cases. He believes that Ellis v. Atkinson is to be classed with Atkins v. Dewbury, Butler v. Duncomb, and Howard v. Dumant, which would seem to favour the notion, that the reversionary interest of a married woman in personal property can be in all respects effectually disposed of, without any preliminary steps to accelerate it, especially if the wife consents in court,—a notion which we have seen is now completely exploded.

X. Where personalty is limited by will in trust for a person for life, with remainder in trust for a daughter, who marries, and the tenant for life makes a gift of the life interest to the daughter's husband, the court will not transfer the property in court to the husband, even with the wife's consent. Pickard v. Roberts, 5 Mad. 384.

In this case, also, there is no change of the reversionary interest into an interest in possession; for, as the husband has no interest analogous to an estate in remainder in such property, but only the right to reduce the reversionary interest into possession when in a state capable of being so reduced, he has nothing in which the life interest could merge. And hence this decision does not conflict with the cases of Dowdell v. Earle, Lackton v. Adams, Creed v. Perry, and Wilson v. Oldham, any more than the case of Richards v. Chambers clashes with them.

XI. Where personalty is limited by deed in trust for a person for life, with remainder in trust for his wife for life, with remainder to such of her children as she shall appoint, and, in default of appointment, in trust for such children; and she makes an appointment of part to one child, and joins with the husband in assigning their respective life interests to that child; the court will not take her consent, and compel the trustees to pay over the money to such child. Fraser v. Baillie, 1 Bro. C. C. 518.

In this case, again, there is no change of the reversionary interest into an interest in possession; for the assignment by the wife is a nullity; and, for the reasons given with reference to the above case of Pickard v. Roberts and the case of Bean v. Sykes, (mentioned infra), the husband's assignment is incapable of passing the wife's reversionary interest so as to subject it to the operation of merger.

It was not attempted, indeed, to support the application in this case on the ground of merger. The prayer of the bill was, that the consent of the wife might be taken in the nature of a fine at common law of real property. And Baron Eyre objected, that it did not occur to him that the court had authorised the departure with the property of the wife, by examining her in the nature of a fine at law. And, as to the same point, Sir John Leach, V. C., remarked, in Pickard v. Roberts, "that a wife, by her consent in a court of equity, can only part with that interest which is a creature of a court of equity, the right which she has in a court of equity to claim a provision by way of settlement on herself and children, out of that property which the husband at law would take in possession in her right." And in Richards v. Chambers, Sir W. Grant, M. R., observed, "This case is not like those in which the husband has a right to the trust property of his wife, subject only to an [equitable] obligation to make some provision for her before he reduces it into possession. When the wife, upon examination, consents to relinquish that equity, it is not by virtue of a disposing power in her, or by the intervention of the court, that the property passes to the husband. His marital right is allowed to operate unobstructed by the equity which the wife does not oppose to it. The equity being out of the way, the right stands unqualified, and upon that the court decrees; but here is no pretence of right on the part of the husband." (10 Ves. 687).

While we have seen that the case of Fraser v. Baillie does not clash with the cases of Dowell v. Harris, Lockett v. Adams, Oreed v. Perry, and Wilson v. Oldham, and while the writer believes there is no case which really does conflict with them, he is not aware that there are any other cases in favour of the doctrine which they support.

There is, indeed, another case (Bean v. Sykes) which has been brought forward in support of the doctrine, that the reversionary interests of married women in personal property may be effectually dealt with, but which, the writer submits, is not to be relied on to that extent. According to this case, where personal property is bequeathed upon trust for a person for life, with remainder to a woman who afterwards marries, and her husband assigns her reversionary interest to a trustee, upon certain trusts, and afterwards, by a deed, in which the wife joins, the prior interest is surrendered by the tenant for life to such trustee, for the purpose of merging it, the latter thereby becomes entitled in possession to the property upon the trust of the deed of assignment to him, and a court of equity will direct the trustee under the will to pay it over to him accordingly. (Bean v. Sykes, reported 2 Hayes' Conv., 5th ed., p. 640).

In this case the reversionary interest was assigned by the husband to the trustee above mentioned, upon trust, in default of appointment, for the separate use of the wife. But the effect of the transaction could not have depended on the assignment to her separate use; for, if that were the case, it would only be necessary for a husband to assign his wife's reversionary interest to her separate use, in order to give her the power of making an effectual disposition of the property even as against herself. Again, the act of the wife in joining in the deed whereby the life interest was surrendered was a mere nullity. And, as to the voluntary assignment by the husband of her reversionary interest, it could not pass that reversionary interest to the trustee in such a way as to lead to the merger of the life interest surrendered to the trustee. We have seen that the husband has only the right to reduce the chose in action into possession when in a state capable of being so reduced; and by a voluntary assignment no more would pass to the assignee in any event than the husband himself possessed at the time of the assignment. And the truth is, that the decree in Bean v. Sykes only amounted to an authority to the original trustee to transfer the fund to the new trustees, and cannot properly be regarded as determining the question as to the general power of making an effectual disposition of the reversionary interest of a married woman.

(To be concluded next week with Part II, comprising the general result of the cases, with some reasons in support of the practicability of dealing with reversionary interests of married women by means of acceleration).

LONDON, JUNE 20, 1846.

THE case of Paxton v. The Great North of England Railway Company, reported in one of our recent Numbers, (ante, p. 430), establishes, if it does not, indeed, introduce, a rule of great practical importance in the law of arbitration. A cause was referred by an order of Nisi Prius, by which it was ordered that there should be a verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the award of a barrister, and that he should state on the face of his award such points of law for the opinion and decision of the court thereon as either of the said parties might raise and require him so to state. The arbitrator, by his award, awarded, that, unless the court should otherwise direct, the verdict already entered for the plaintiff in the cause should stand, but that the same should be reduced to a sum named by him. And, reciting that he had been required by the plaintiff and the defendants respectively to state certain points of law for the opinion of the court, proceeded to state all such of the said points of law as the evidence before him was capable of raising, and further awarded, that, if the court should be of opinion that any of the items which he had disallowed to the plaintiff and the defendants respectively ought to be admitted, and if the balance resulting from such corrected items should exceed, or should, save as after mentioned, fall short of the sum before named by him, that the verdict already entered for the plaintiff should stand, but that the same should be reduced to such amount of debt as, in the opinion of the court, should be due to the plaintiff, with 1s. damages, instead of the amount of debt which he had awarded; but if the court should be of opinion, upon the point first raised, that the action was not maintainable for more than the sum paid into court, or if the balance adjudged to be due to the plaintiff upon such corrected items should be reduced by a sum larger than or equal to the sum named by him, he awarded that the general verdict entered for the plaintiff should be set aside, and that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiff on the first, and for the defendants on the second and third issues. The award was made on the 13th November, 1844, and was taken up by the plaintiff. The defendants received notice of the making of it on the 16th November, and, on the fourth day of the following Hilary Term, a rule was moved for and obtained on their behalf, for setting aside the award, and entering the verdict for the defendants on the several issues. The court held, first, on the authority of Anderson v. Fuller, (4 Mee. & W. 470; 7 Dowl. P. C. 51), that this was, in effect, an application to set aside the award; and, secondly, that it was made too late, and ought to have been made at the latest within four days of the defendants receiving notice of the making of the award.

As to the first point, in Anderson v. Fuller, an arbitrator had by his award directed that the verdict should stand for the plaintiff on all the issues, but that the damages should be reduced to a certain sum; and then, after reciting that he had been requested by the parties to state the facts, he proceeded to set forth the circumstances of the case, whereby a question was raised, whether the defendant was liable for certain acts of his co-trustees; and concluded by directing, that if, under the circumstances above stated, the defendant was liable in law to those parts only of the plaintiff's demand which were directed by himself, the damages should be reduced to a certain sum; if he was not liable in law for any part, then that the verdict should be entered for the defendant. And the court held, that on application to enter the verdict for the defendant, or to reduce the damages upon the facts stated by the arbitrator on the face of his award, ought to have been made (the cause and all matters in difference being referred) within the second term inclusive after the publication of the award. They were of opinion that it was an express award of the larger amount, and that the application was, in effect, to set it aside.

In the principal case there was, in like manner, an express award of the larger amount, and Anderson v. Fuller is expressly in point; but there is this distinction to be observed between the two cases. In Anderson v. Fuller, as in Barton v. Ransom (3 Mee. & W. 322) and In re Wright and the Cromford Canal Company, (1 Q. B. Rep. 98; 4 Per. & D. 730), the arbitrator had no power given him by the submission to state the facts for the opinion of the court, and unless he had himself come to an express decision, his award would have been bad; and, indeed, it would seem, from the last-cited case, that, if the court thought the express finding of the arbitrator to be wrong, they could not direct the verdict to be entered according to the hypothetical finding, but must set aside the award in toto. The application to the court, therefore, in such cases is clearly to set aside the award. But, where, as in the principal case, the arbitrator has power to raise points of law for the opinion of the court, he need not, and indeed ought not, to come to an express decision, but should find in the alternative as the court may decide the question raised on the face of the award. (Watson on Awards, 3rd ed., p. 281; Bradbee v. Christ's Hospital, 2 Dowl., N. S., 164; Scott v. Vansandau, 8 Jur. 1114). To the case of an award so made we apprehend Anderson v. Fuller is not applicable, and the application to the court should be regarded not as an application to set aside the award, but, as was argued in the principal case, as in the nature of an application for the judgment of the court upon a special case or a special verdict. In the one case the award may be acted upon without any application to the court, in the other it is inoperative without it.

In the principal case the arbitrator had improperly, as we think, made an express award, and, therefore, it might well be argued that Anderson v. Fuller was in point; but we venture to suggest, that, if he had made his award in the alternative, the court ought to have adopted a different rule, and have treated the application as for judgment upon a special case or a special verdict. But, whether applicable to awards of this kind or confined to those in which the arbitrator is bound to come to an express decision, the rule laid down in the principal case, as to the time for making the application to the court, is of great practical importance. Mr. Justice Patteson says, that the application ought to have been made on the 19th or 20th November at the latest, the defendants having on the 16th received notice of the making of the award. Taking the whole of the judgment, the rule is laid down that the application must be made within four days of the publication, if that takes place in term. Mr. Justice Coleridge's dictum in Allenby v. Proudlock, (4 Dowl. P. C. 54; Har. & Woll. 357), which was recognised and adopted by the court, is to that effect, and the analogy to motions for new trials upon which they acted leads to the same conclusion. Lord Denman says, "It is very desirable that there should be a general rule that these motions should be made within four days from the publication of the award; it would not bind parties from that which is called publication, if it were not so." What, then, is publication? Were the four days to be calculated from the 13th, when the award was made and taken up by the plaintiff, or from the 16th, when the defendants received notice of the making of it? Lord Denman says, "That is publication, according to reasonable construction, which is a notification of the award to the party, as much as the giving of the verdict in a case, as we held in Macarthur v. Campbell, (5 B. & Adol. 518; 2 Nev. & M. 444)." It would, certainly, be unjust to hold that the four days commenced from the making of the award and notice to one party, although the other did not receive notice until afterwards, as that might altogether prevent him from having the award set aside; but, unless we give to the word "publication" two different meanings, it must be so held.

In Brooke v. Mitchell, (6 Mee. & W. 473; 8 Dowl. P. C. 392), where a submission required the award to be made, and published, and ready for delivery to the parties, and after the award had been made and before notice one of the parties died, it was held that the award was made and published, within the meaning of the submission, before notice. But, in the same case, it is admitted, that, for the purpose of setting aside an award under the statute 9 & 10 Will. 3, c. 15, an award is only considered to be published when the parties have notice that it is made. And in this sense must the term "publication" be used in the rule laid down in the principal case; but we think it would be more correctly expressed, by saying, that an application to set aside an award, where the cause only is referred, must be made within the first four days in term, after notice of the award to the party making the application; and, subject to the doubt we have suggested as to its applying to all awards, we lay it before our readers as the rule to be observed in practice.

THE LAW
DISPOSITION OF REVERSIONARY INTERESTS OF MARRIED WOMEN IN CHATTELS PERSONAL.

PART II.

The General Result of the Cases, with some Reasons in support of the practicability of dealing with Reversionary Interests of Married Women by means of Acceleration.

The general result of the cases may be briefly stated in these general terms:—

I. An assignment by a married woman of a vested reversionary interest in chattels personal, if bequeathed or settled to her separate use, will be binding upon her even after the determination of the coverture.

II. A married woman cannot directly deprive herself or be deprived of a reversionary interest, as such, in personalty not given for her separate use, so effectually that she will be precluded from asserting a claim to it, if her husband dies before her without having reduced it into possession.

III. But (even setting aside the authority of Dorwell v. Earle) a married woman may deprive herself or be deprived of chattels personal in which she has a vested reversionary interest, by means of the conversion of that reversionary interest into an interest in possession in herself, through the operation of merger consequent upon a surrender or assignment made to her of the prior life interest, where, at least, the party to whom that prior life interest is limited is some other person than her own husband; and by means of a subsequent reduction of the property into the possession of the husband.

IV. If, however, the reversionary interest of a married woman in personalty is contingent, and bequeathed or settled to her separate use, and, a fortiori, if it be contingent and not bequeathed or settled to her separate use, she cannot deprive herself or be deprived of it, so as to be bound after the determination of the coverture.

With regard to the third of these propositions, we have seen that such is the doctrine of Lachton v. Adams, Creed v. Perry, and Wilson v. Oldham, and that such was the opinion of that very eminent lawyer, the late Mr. Jacob. And the writer of these observations submits, that this doctrine is perfectly sound in principle, although certain doubts would seem to be entertained upon this point by many learned members of the Profession.

1. One ground of doubt is, that a feme has a general right to disagree to and waive a purchase or gift on becoming discover. Now, with regard to this, a married woman may even acquire real estate by purchase; and the conveyance thereof to her is good in the first instance, and continues good during the coverture, or until her husband disagrees to it. And although it is true that she may disagree to and waive the purchase after her husband's death, (2 Bl. Com. 292; Co. Litt. 3. a.; 1 Bac. Abr., tit. "Baron and Feme"), yet this does not amount to a disclaimer of it, and denial of the estate having ever vested in her, but simply to a disagreement as to retaining what had vested in her while covert, and a waiver of it from the time of such disagreement; for it may be observed, that, in the books, disclaimer and disagreement are mentioned as two distinct ways of avoiding a deed, (see 4 Vin. Abr., tit. "Disagreement and Disclaimer," and 4 Cru. Dig., c. 26); every disagreement not being a disclaimer, which is an act that must be evidenced by a deed, though every disclaimer may perhaps be said to be a disagreement. And the fact that disagreement has not the effect of replacing things in the same state in which they were before, appears from a passage in Viner's Abridgment, tit. "Disagreement," A., pl. 6, wherein it is said, that, where a feme covert is enfeoffed, and afterwards the baron disagrees to it, yet all things executed between the livery and disagreement remain good. In fact, disagreement and waiver can have no effect whatever in the case of a surrender of a limited interest, capable, in itself, of merging, and actually merging, in consequence of such surrender. For if merger would be consequent on such surrender in the case of a feme sole, by analogy to real estate, and because it would be absurd that a life interest and the absolute interest in quasi remainder should continue to subsist as distinct interests in the same person; merger would be equally consequent in the case of a feme covert, unless any obstruction arises from the principles of equity in favor of a feme covert; merger being the result of the union of the two estates or interests, irrespective of the legal character of the party in whom they are united. But, as we shall presently see, no such obstruction exists, so that merger does take place. And if merger once takes place, the prior interest is thereby absorbed or extinguished; and if once absorbed or extinguished, it must for ever cease to exist. If, indeed, a feme, on becoming discover, disagrees to a conveyance to her in fee, or to an assignment of the absolute interest in personalty, she may disagree to that to some purpose; for the subject-matter of the conveyance must necessarily exist, and the subject-matter of an assignment of that kind of interest may exist. But if she disagrees to and waives a surrender or assignment of a limited interest after merger has taken place, she cannot thereby call into existence again that interest which has been absorbed or extinguished, and therefore is necessarily gone for ever.

2. But, secondly, it is said, that, although the feme may be unable to avoid the transaction by disagreeing to and waiving the surrender or assignment, yet the contrivance must be inefficient, because, even admitting her vested reversionary interest might be merged, yet her contingent right by survivorship cannot be merged. The reply to this objection is, that there is no such thing as a contingent right by survivorship, considered as in any way distinct from her vested reversionary interest. It is true that the term is used by Mr. Jacob in the opinion which led to the institution of the suit of Wilson v. Oldham; and it is in fact in common use, and is doubtless very convenient to express with brevity the right which a married woman has to a reversionary interest in personal property, if her husband predecease her without having reduced the property into possession. But if it is supposed, that, on the death of the husband in the lifetime of the wife, there accrues to her any right or title to the property in which her reversionary interest subsists, distinct from that which she had during the coverture, such a notion is erroneous. The true state of the case is simply this: the very same kind of right to the property which constituted her reversionary interest in such property, and which she had at the moment of marriage, she continues to have during the coverture, unaltered by the marriage except in regard to the cessation of her disposing power; and the very same right, and nothing more, she still has after the coverture has ceased. She gains no new right to the property by surviving her husband: properly speaking, she has no right by survivorship; her right is quite independent of survivorship. If her interest is reduced into possession by the husband during the coverture or merged, she loses all right, whether she survives him or not. If, on the other hand, it is not reduced into possession by him or merged, her right continues in her during the coverture and after the coverture has ceased. The only difference in this last case between the right as existing during the coverture, and the right as existing after the coverture has ceased, is this; that, after the coverture has ceased, the right is no longer liable to be defeated by the reduction of the property into possession by the husband, and it is alienable by the feme. A right by survivorship, therefore, as a distinct thing from the reversionary interest itself, has no existence. The reversionary interest itself is that which constitutes the right, and the only right, which the feme has, not only in her husband's lifetime, but also after his decease. If that reversionary interest has ceased to exist, by reason of merger or otherwise, no right remains to her at all, whether her husband be living or dead.

3. It is said that the above mode of barring the wife, by the acceleration of her reversionary interest, is repugnant to the course taken by courts of equity in regard to married women; and that an obstruction arises from the doctrines of equity to the adoption of that mode as an effectual means of attaining the desired end.

If it be objected, that, by establishing and carrying out any such arrangement as that above alluded to, a court of equity is depriving a married woman, or assisting her to deprive herself, of rights which she would have at law, the answer to this objection is, that, when the prior life interest has been surrendered or assigned, in such a way that (but for any supposed obstruction from the doctrines of equity) it would merge in the reversionary interest, and such reversionary interest would thereby be converted into an interest in possession, the wife loses all right at law, if she ever had any, without the interference of a court of equity. If the reversionary interest is a legal interest, she loses it by the legal operation of the surrender or assignment, in creating a state of things in which the legal consequence of merger ensues, which accelerates the reversionary interest, and places the property in the power of the husband, without the interference of a court of equity. Equity, in this case, even if it be called upon to establish or sanction such an arrangement, does not deprive the married woman of her legal rights, or assist her in depriving herself of them; for the operation of law, consequent upon the legal acts of third persons, has already taken away those legal rights; and all that the court does is this: to declare that those legal rights have been taken away, and that the property is to be dealt with accordingly. And if the reversionary interest is an equitable interest, then, of course, it would be a contradiction in terms to speak of her having any right at law. Equity, in this case, only acts according to its well-known course of assimilating equitable and legal interests, in accordance with its maxim, "Equity follows the law;" allowing the same effect to the assignment or surrender in equity, in the case of such an equitable interest, as it would possess at law in the case of a legal interest; just as it allows the husband's disposal of his wife's reversionary interest, and even contingent interest, in the trust of a term for years to bind the wife, by analogy to the effect of his assignment of her legal reversionary interest in a term. Donne v. Hart, 2 Russ. & My. 360.

If it be urged, that the plan in question is a fraudulent contrivance to deprive the feme of the provision which she would otherwise have, there does not appear to be any real foundation for the objection.

First, it is no fraud on the intention of the author of the instrument creating the reversionary interest, or not more so than other transactions which are allowed every day. How can it be supposed that this contrivance would be invalid on the ground of fraud, when a court of equity holds, that if a reversionary interest, and even a contingent interest, of a married woman in the trust of a term for years, is sold by her husband, such sale will bind her, though the husband dies in her lifetime, and while the interest still continues reversionary and contingent? (Donne v. Hart, 2 Russ. & My. 360; 2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 1410). But, even setting aside this argument, if an immediate interest in personalty be given in trust for a married woman for life, with remainder over, it is no fraud in her husband to dispose of it at once; yet there can be little doubt, that, by so doing, he disappoints the intentions of the giver. Now, as regards the design of the giver of a reversionary interest to a married woman, there is no more manifestation of a design to secure a provision for the wife against the marital power in this case, than in the former case of an immediate interest; nor is there even any proof of a desire that she should not enjoy the property until the time fixed for the commencement of her enjoyment thereof, except so far as there is a desire to benefit the prior taker by the postponement of such enjoyment for his sake. The obvious and actual motive for the postponement is, to benefit the prior taker, not to secure a provision for the subsequent taker against the marital power, or to deprive her, for any reason personal to herself, of the enjoyment of that provision until the period actually fixed for the commencement of such enjoyment.

Secondly, the above-mentioned contrivance for barring a married woman is no fraud on the policy of the law or of the courts of equity. Where is the supposed especial favour with which a married woman is treated by a court of equity, as against her husband's power, independently of an express and unequivocal intention of the author of an instrument, except so far as the court enforces a settlement out of her own property, unless she waives it? The creation of a separate inalienable estate is a mere carrying out of the express and unequivocal intention of the giver of the property. If there were any such especial favour, why is it not shewn in regard to equitable reversionary interests in terms for years? Why is it not shewn in giving dower of a trust estate in cases not within the Dower Act?

There is no doctrine to the effect, that, where the interest of a married woman happens to be circumstanced in such a way that it cannot be affected while it continues to be so circumstanced, no means shall be used to change the circumstances, so as to place the interest in a position to be affected. To act upon such a doctrine, would be in direct contravention of the fundamental maxim, that equity follows the law, and, after all, would, in many cases, as in Macarrie v. Buller, be the greatest possible unkindness to the wife herself. In a case in which the writer was instructed, a short time ago, to settle a deed to bar the claim of a married woman to her reversionary interest, the prior taker, who was the widow of the author of that reversionary interest, was desirous of giving up her life interest in a small fund, in order to settle in business the husband of her daughter to whom such reversionary interest was limited. Can it be supposed, that, in a case of this kind, a court of equity would be doing a real kindness to the wife, or best satisfying the intentions of the author of the provision for her, if it rigidly secured that provision against all means to bring it within the marital power in the lifetime of the prior taker? And, besides these considerations, why should that provision be so carefully guarded against the marital power during the lifetime of the prior taker, when, at the instant of such prior taker's decease in the lifetime of the husband, it becomes at once subject to his disposing power?

4. But it is further objected, that it is a maxim, that what cannot be done directly, shall not be done indirectly. This maxim, however, does not apply to the present subject; it only applies to an attempt to do that which is contrary to some fundamental rule or principle of policy. The attempt in question is not of that character; being only an attempt to bar the claim of a feme to an interest in personal property by taking away its reversionary character. The maxim above mentioned no more applies to this attempt, than it applies to the plan of barring her dower by means of the ordinary uses to bar dower, where prior to the late Dower Act, no direct attempt, by means of a conveyance or express declaration, could have accomplished that purpose.

No case has yet been adjudged, where an attempt has been made to dispose of personal property in which a married woman has a reversionary interest, by the use of the preliminary means of merger and acceleration, where the prior interest has been limited to the husband himself. But the writer inclines to the opinion, that, even where the husband is the prior taker, the same means of surrender, merger, and acceleration of the wife's reversionary interest may be effectually employed, as a mode of placing that interest within the power of the husband. But, of course, in this case, in which the prior interest is limited to the husband, a preliminary assignment by the husband will be necessary: he must first assign his prior interest to a third person; and then the surrender may be made by such third person to the wife.

All the previous reasoning as to the cases where the husband himself is not the prior taker, except that which is directed against the objection, that the transaction in question is a fraud upon the intention of the author of the instrument, equally applies to cases where the husband is the first taker. But that objection is far more difficult to meet in cases of the kind last mentioned: yet, when the matter is closely considered, it is conceived that it may be completely disposed of, even as it applies to those cases.

Where an interest is limited to a married woman by way of remainder after a life interest given by the same instrument to her husband, a provision is made for her, after her husband's death, by the very terms of the instrument; and, at first sight, it does seem a fraud on the instrument to adopt a contrivance which has the effect of depriving her of the provision so made for her, and limited to commence at a time which is capable of being regarded as personal to herself—at a time when the wife in general stands most in need of property of her own. But, on closer consideration, there would seem to be but little weight in this objection. The time of enjoyment is not of the essence of the intention in this case. Even in this case, the prima facie motive for the postponement of the enjoyment till the period of the husband's decease, is, to benefit the husband, as the prior taker. What the author of the instrument essentially intended was, to make a provision, generally, for the married woman; but, as there was a concurrent intention to make a provision for her husband also, the general intention for providing for the wife is accomplished by giving her a reversionary interest after a life interest in her husband. The prima facie reason, then, why her interest was reversionary, and incapable, as such, of being reduced into the possession of the husband, is not a reason personal to herself, and not a reason affording any peculiar ground for supposing an exemption from marital power to have been particularly intended; and not a reason, therefore, which effectually distinguishes this case of a provision for the wife after her husband's death, or, in other words, this case of a reversionary interest expectant on the determination of a life interest in the husband, from the other cases where the prior life interest is limited to a third person. The benefit of the prior taker is the prima facie reason of the postponement; or, at all events, that is a reason which fully accounts for the postponement, and to which such postponement may consequently be fairly attributed. And if this be so, there is no substantial reason, founded on the supposed intention of the author of the instrument, why legal means should not be used by the husband for reducing the interest of the wife into possession, by taking away the reversionary character of the interest which prima facie was given to it, or may be fairly regarded as given to it, not for the benefit of the wife, but in order to provide for him in the first instance; or, at least, no more reason why this should be considered as a fraud on the intention of the author of the instrument, than an absolute disposition by the husband of an immediate interest limited in trust for his wife for her life, (not for her separate use), with remainder over, or of her equitable reversionary interest in a term for years, or than the analogous case of a disposition by the husband and wife of her trust estate in real property expectant on a life estate in himself.

But it will be said, that, as the state of the law must be presumed to have been known by the author of an instrument, and as the general impression of the Profession has been that such a reversionary interest could not be effectually dealt with; so, a reversionary provision may have been made for the feme, rather than an immediate one, for the very purpose of protecting it from the marital power. This, however, is purely conjecture. The desire of providing for the husband in the first instance, as we have seen, is a reason which may fairly be regarded as fully accounting for the reversionary character of the wife's provision. And, if the author of the instrument designed to secure a provision for the wife against her husband, we have seen that he could have effectually accomplished that design, by making it contingent on her survivorship. But, even if that was clearly and unequivocally his design, in the limitation in question, still the frustration of that design by the use of ordinary legal means would be no more objectionable, as a fraud on his intention, than the barring of an entail with the view of selling the entailed estate and spending the proceeds. Yet, in regard to entails of equitable interests, a court of equity has allowed them to be barred by the same means as legal interests, instead of refusing to sanction such transactions on the ground of fraud on the issue, who are entitled to the consideration of the court, and, in the case of an entail under a settlement, are purchasers for valuable consideration. And, as equity, in this instance, allows legal means to have an effect on equitable interests analogous to the effect which those means would have on legal interests; so, it ought to allow the same means which would be effectual in the disposition of a married woman's legal reversionary interest in personal estate, to be as effectual in the case of her equitable reversionary interest. For it is a fundamental maxim, that equity follows the law; the true meaning of which (as the writer has endeavoured to shew in his "Manual of Equity Jurisprudence," pp. 18—24) is, that equity is governed by legislative enactments and the rules of law in regard to legal estates, rights, and interests, and that it is regulated by the analogy of such legal estates, rights, and interests, and the legislative enactments and rules of law affecting the same, in regard to equitable estates, rights, and interests, where any such analogy plainly subsists, if, in each case, there are no peculiar circumstances rendering it absolutely necessary to deviate from this rule, or creating an equitable obligation in one of the litigant parties, and an equitable correlative right in favour of another litigant party, and requiring a different course to be taken in the particular case, without overturning or destroying the general application of any legislative enactments or rules of law that may, in terms or by analogy, apply to the case. In the case with which we are now concerned, we are speaking of the "general application" of certain rules or principles of law to the case of reversionary interests, where there are no "peculiar circumstances." Any real or supposed hardship that would result from the general application of the legal rules or principles of merger to such interests, would not constitute a sufficient ground for withholding the general application of those rules or principles. For, equity follows the law, even where, by so doing, great hardship is occasioned; as in the case of following the rules of primogeniture in instances where all the younger children are wholly unprovided for.

If the contrivance for barring a married woman by merger and acceleration be allowed, no doubt great evil will result in many cases, by leaving a widow entirely destitute. But, on the other hand, as in Batt v. Cuthbertson, there are many cases where a reduction of the wife's interest into possession may rescue a whole family, the wife herself included, from abject and hopeless destitution, or from difficulties of the most trying character; where the preservation of that interest would be attended with no other good than to provide for an event (that of the survivorship of the wife) which is as likely not to happen as to happen, and which the wife herself would of course rejoice to risk. The truth would seem to be, that it is impossible to determine this question on principles of expediency. And, as a question of legal and equitable principle, the writer conceives, that, looking to the analogies of equity jurisprudence, the preponderance of principle is in favour of the validity of the mode of disposition above pointed out, even where the husband himself has the prior life interest. For he submits, that, according to those analogies, equity ought to follow the law by sanctioning the acceleration of her equitable reversionary interest, and ought to confine its protective care to the enforcing of her equity to a settlement out of such interests, unless she consents to waive the same.

LONDON, JUNE 27, 1846.

The judicial storm which has long been threatening the abandoned railway undertakings, has at length marked and burst upon its victim. Henceforth provisional directors will have to run the gauntlet, after the manner of American Indian prisoners, through a lane lined with a double row of enemies,—allottees on the one side, and on the other, engineers, solicitors, tradesmen, &c.; and with a stab from "Walstab v. Spottiswoode" on the one side, or "Wontner v. Sharp" on the other, and with a huge sweeping blow from the old and tried sword of "Nockels v. Crosby," as a crowning mercy at the end,—happy will they be if the very race of provisional directors is not swept from the face of the country, as an expiatory sacrifice for the gambling sins of nearly the whole English community.

In a former Number (Vol 10, p. 110) we took the liberty of presenting some reasonings against the application of Nockels v. Crosby (3 B. & C. 814) to the case of modern allottees in projected railway companies. The case of Walstab v. Spottiswoode (ante, p. 460) has, however, disposed judicially of all arguments against Nockels v. Crosby, whether considered per se, or with reference to the modern transaction of contracting to take shares in a projected railroad company, which afterwards does not reach the state of a mature company. The broad doctrine, now gradually becoming consolidated seems to be this: that, if a railway scheme is projected under the paternity and care of persons acting as a provisional committee; if, to the invitation of those persons to the public to take shares, stating that the company is intended to comprise a given number of shares, making together a given capital, individuals of the public respond by agreeing to take shares; and if the scheme is abandoned, by reason of an insufficient number of shareholders coming in, before reaching the state of an actual legally constituted company,—then the persons composing the provisional committee are solely liable for all expenses incurred, and the individuals agreeing to take shares, are precisely in the same situation as if they had never agreed; that is, they are not bound to pay any portion of their deposits, if they have not already paid them, and are entitled to recover them back, if they have paid them.

The doctrine laid down in the very recent case of Wontner v. Sharp, goes a step further than even Walstab v. Spottiswoode, to the effect that an allottee is not bound even by signing the company deed, if the concern is broken up before completion.

The proposition contained in these cases, we must now take undoubtedly to be the law; but it is not, as it appears to us, either very rational or very equitable. Let us examine it a little. Until such a number of shares is taken as will justify the provisional committee in hoping to carry on the scheme successfully to its parliamentary termination, they cannot feel safe in paying any expenses; because, according to the late cases, if they should happen to be obliged to break up in a state of incompleteness, every shilling that they have expended, must be paid by them; while, without incurring expenses, they cannot have the slightest prospect of obtaining further subscriptions for shares, because, to obtain such subscriptions, information must be collected and diffused at a very considerable expense. Thus provisional committees will be practically prevented from taking the means of doing that, the not doing of which, is to throw upon them a purely personal responsibility.

The tendency of this is not very clearly consistent with commercial policy; for, of course, as to all existing incomplete undertakings, if the provisional committee-men are men of straw, who have taken the company merely with a view to raising shares to a mium for the purpose of speculation, they, caring for nothing that can happen, and knowing, that, if the company breaks up, the demand against themselves is a right without a remedy, have every inducement to support one fraudulent contrivance by another, and to continue, as long as they can, a course of expenditure for the purpose of carrying the scheme forward, taking the chance of profit that may arise in the course or in the result of such proceedings, and setting all creditors at defiance by the hopelessness of their insolvency, should the concern fail, and be broken up. But, upon bona fide fair schemes, got up by men of some substance, with a view to the actual business for which the company purports to be created, the effect of the decisions will be totally different. Provisional committee-men who have something to lose, will be indisposed, precisely in the ratio of their prudence, and, therefore, of their fitness for carrying forward the business they have undertaken, to incur further expenses, which they now know will fall entirely upon themselves, if they are prevented by circumstances, over which they may or may not have control, from obtaining the requisite number of shares.

The tendency, therefore, is to induce the keeping together of swindling companies, headed by incompetent and dishonest men, and to break up the best companies headed by the best men. These considerations may or may not have been present to the mind of the court in Walsh v. Spottiswoode, or, being present to the mind of the court, they may have been thought unfit to be considered as grounds of legal reasoning. However this may be, we cannot doubt that the general doctrine of law is settled by that case, nor do we individually doubt that it is a doctrine replete with mischief as regards commercial policy. When a sufficient number of cases has been decided on the important questions affecting railway liabilities, we shall endeavour to present to our readers a careful legal analysis of them.
